V. 18. It is probable, that the captains of the army avowed to the men of Dothan, their purpose in thus surrounding the place; and expected their concurrence in apprehending Elisha, as the condition of their own preservation.—But the prophet, secure of the divine protection, seems to have gone out to the Syrians, who, in answer to his prayer, were deprived for the time of the proper use of their eyes, so that they could not distinguish one object from another; and yet they were not sensible of their own incapacity! (Note, Gen. 19: 11.) Thus the miracle was reversed in respect of them, from that with which the prophet's servant had been favored: he saw what was invisible to others; they could not see what all others could.

V. 19, 20. The prophet intended to deceive the Syrians: and this might lawfully have been done, even if he had meant to treat them as enemies, in order to his own preservation; but he designed them no harm by the deception. He was no longer in Dothan, and they in reality had no business there: but he truly informed them, that if they would follow him, he would bring them to the man whom they sought: and accordingly, when they were so infatuated as to follow a stranger, and so bewildered as to enter Samaria, he made himself known to them; and the miraculous suspension of their eye-sight being removed, they saw themselves at the mercy of the king of Israel.

to their master. [v] So the bands of Syria came no more into the land of Israel.

[Practical Observations.]

24 ¶ And it came to pass after this, that Ben-hadad king of Syria [x] gathered all his host, and went up, and besieged Samaria.

25 And there was [y] a great famine in Samaria: and, behold, they besieged it, until [z] an ass's head was sold for four-score pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of dove's dung for five pieces of silver.

26 And as the king of Israel was passing by upon the wall, there cried a woman unto him, saying, [a] Help, my lord, O king.

27 And he said, * If the LORD do not help thee, [b] whence shall I help thee? out of the barn-floor, or out of the wine-press?

28 And the king said unto her, [c] What aileth thee? And she answered, This woman said unto me, [d] Give thy son that we may eat him to-day, and we will eat my son to-morrow.

29 So we boiled my son, and did eat him: and I said unto her on the † next day, Give thy son, that we may eat him; and [e] she hath hid her son.

30 And it came to pass, when the king heard the words of the woman, tha [f] he rent his clothes; and he passed by upon the wall, and the people looked, and behold he had sackcloth within upon his flesh.

31 Then he said, [g] God do so and more also to me, [h] if the head of Elisha the son of Shaphat shall stand on him this day.

32 But Elisha sat in his house, and [i] the elders sat with him; and the king sent a man from before him: but [k] ere the messenger came to him, he said to the elders, [l] See how this [m] son of a murderer hath sent to take away mine head? look when the messenger cometh, shut the door, and hold him fast at the door: is not [n] the sound of his master's feet behind him?

33 And while he yet talked with them,

V. 21—23. Jehoram, when he became acquainted with the singular event, was eager to smite the Syrian troops; but he was very respectful to the prophet who had put them in his power, and would not act without his permission. When Elisha therefore had shewn him the impropriety of slaughtering prisoners of war, whom he had taken captive; much more that of smiting those whom God had led into that situation; he desisted from his purpose: nay, he obeyed the prophet's orders in liberally entertaining and then dismissing the whole army! Let them 'go to their master," and 'tell him what civility and kindness there is among 'the people of God.' Bp. Patrick. Yet this very man soon after determined to murder this same prophet! (Notes, 31. Matt. 14:3—11. Mark 6:15—29.) The Syrians, however, no more attempted to apprehend Elisha: and the soldiers were perhaps so won by his clemency, or afraid of his power, that they ceased from molesting the land by depredations; until Ben-hadad had collected his whole force to besiege Samaria some time afterwards.

V. 24. It seems that Ben-hadad met with little opposition, till he came to Samaria.

V. 25. If the pieces of silver here mentioned were shekels, above ten pounds sterling was, on this occasion, paid for the head of an unclean animal, not generally used in food, and affording very little sustenance; whilst about twelve shillings were given for about three pints of very mean pulse, called dove's dung; or, as some think, of the undigested corn taken from the crop, or craw, of that fowl. However this may be explained, the prices shew the extremity of the famine. It is sufficient to suppose, that each of these bargains was once actually made, in the urgency of hunger.

V. 26. Help, &c.] הוֹשִׁיעָה: "Save my lord, O king," 'Save me from perishing by hunger by in-'terposing thine authority in my behalf.'

V. 27. (Marg.) This may be understood as the language of passion, or desperation: as if Jehoram had said, 'The Lord will not, and I cannot, 'help thee; but we must all perish together.'

V. 28, 29. The truth and awful justice of God upon the idolatrous Israelites were displayed in this most horrible transaction. The extremity of hunger, inducing rage and madness, and extinguishing humanity and natural affection, prepared the way for such actions, as at other times the persons themselves would have abhorred the thoughts of. But this was repeatedly foretold as the punishment of Israel's apostacy from God; and more instances of it occur in their history, than in the records perhaps of all other nations. (Notes, Lev. 26:29. Deut. 28:49—57. Lam. 2:20—22. 4:10. Ez. 5:10.)

V. 30. The king mourned his own miseries and those of the people, and he assumed the garment of a penitent: (Notes, 1 Kings 21:27—29. Is. 58:3—7. Joel 2:12—14.) but he did not renounce his idolatries; and he grew more desperate in his rebellion, through the extremities to which he was reduced.

V. 31. Either Elisha had denounced this judgment upon Jehoram for his sins; or Jehoram supposed that it was sent in answer to his prayers; or he thought the prophet could help him if he would; or he blamed him, for inducing him to dismiss the Syrian army, when it was in his power: or perhaps Elisha had counselled him in the name of the Lord to hold out the siege, and that he should be delivered. His rage however, against God, vented itself in menacing violence behold, the messenger came down unto him: and he said, Behold, [o] this evil is of the LORD; what should I [p] wait for the LORD any longer?

to his faithful servant with an oath, and imprecation on himself, if he did not inflict it.—'He 'swore he should not live till night.' Bp. Patrick. (Note, 1 Kings 19:2.)

V. 32, 33. Elisha lodged at Samaria at this time, probably in the school of the prophets, sharing the hardships of that city during the siege and famine; and the elders had resorted to him to entreat his prayers, or to desire his counsel.—The Lord revealed to him Jehoram's intentions: and Elisha called him, "the son of a murderer," as proving himself the genuine offspring of Ahab and Jezebel, who slew the Lord's prophets, and murdered Naboth. (Notes, 1 Kings 14: 5,6. 18:4. 21:7—16.) At his desire the messenger of Jehoram was shut out, till his master, who as Elisha knew would follow him, perhaps to countermand his order, was arrived. And when he was entered, and perhaps exhorted to hope for deliverance; he in a blasphemous manner answered, that the calamity was from the LORD, who would not deliver them; and that it was in vain to wait for him any longer. Probably he meant to infer, that he might as well put Elisha to death, and surrender to Ben-hadad without further delay. (Notes, 25. Job 2:9—11. Jer. 2: 25. Lam. 3:26—30.)—As the messenger was excluded till the king arrived, it is evident that the latter was the speaker of these words, and not his servant in his presence.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

God has often increased his church, by the addition of faithful ministers and true believers, in times of great persecution: for the whole glory is secured to him, when the effect is produced without the aid, and notwithstanding the opposition, of human authority, by the preaching of his word, and the operation of the Holy Spirit. (Note, Zech. 4:4—7.)—Religion indeed always appears to advantage under the cross; when poverty and affliction are endured with cheerful meekness and patience, and when hard labor and mean fare excite no complaints. When men, honored by the Lord as instruments of much good to souls, willingly earn their living by working at some honest calling, rather than burden the people; and yet will not entangle themselves with the affairs of the world to acquire riches for themselves or families; their conduct evidently accords to the spirit of true religion, and seldom fails to attract the attention of numbers to persons, who act upon principles, which are contrary to the general propensities of human nature.—Respect to seniors or superiors becomes those especially, who teach others to "render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and to God the things which are God's;" and contentment with poor accommodations, those who inculcate mortification to the things of time and sense.—There is that pleasantness in the converse of the eminent servants of God, which can make men forget the pain and weariness of labor: and when condescension to the meanest unites with usefulness to the greatest, and with great eminence in the church of God, it confers a peculiar lustre on a man's character.—A pious and generous mind is more disquieted by occasioning loss to others, than by suffering it himself; and peculiar care should be taken of things borrowed.—Our heavenly Father cares for his people in their most minute concerns, and sympathizes with them in their fears and sorrows: (Note, Matt. 10:29—31.) and he peculiarly regards those persons, who are conscientiously afraid of dishonoring religion, through unavoidable poverty, and being unable to render to all their dues.

V. 8—23.

The Lord knows, and can easily defeat, the secret machinations of his enemies. And the profession of being his worshippers will sometimes for a season engage his external protection; in order to the confusion of his avowed enemies, and for the sake of that remnant of true believers with whom they are connected. (Notes, Ex. 32: 7—14. Deut. 32:26,27. Jer. 14:7—9. Ez. 20:7—9.)—Even the wicked are sometimes willing to be counselled by the servants of God in their temporal concerns, and they experience the advantage of this conduct; but they will not take warning "to flee from the wrath to come," or be persuaded to renounce their favorite sins! Wave this subject, do not trouble their consciences or interfere in those things, in which they choose to indulge themselves, and you may obtain their confidence; nay, they will give up their inclinations in other respects by way of compromise.—As prophets were not without honor save in their own country; so numbers profess to honor those that have obtained a good report in the word of God, who would treat them with scorn or enmity, if they could again revisit the earth. For distance of time or place breaks the force of their reproofs; and they can suppose that other sinners, and not themselves, are intended: but when near, they direct the word to the conscience, with "Thou art the man," and except this produce repentance, it must exasperate. Such men, however, prove the insincerity of their professed esteem, by living in habitual neglect of the truths and precepts, which were delivered by the persons, whom they would be thought to admire. (Notes, Matt. 13:54—58. 23:29—33.)—The obstinate rebellion and blindness of fallen man often induce him to strive and expect to prevail against those, whom he cannot deny to be the people of God: but as no outward miracles can extirpate the malignity of the heart, so nothing can injure those whom the Lord protects. Were our eyes opened to behold the world of spirits, we should perceive more formidable preparations against us, than those which alarmed the prophet's servant; even legions of malicious, powerful, and sagacious spirits combined for our destruction: but we should also see an innumerable company of holy angels encamped around us for our defence; and the almighty God himself our Friend and Protector. Strong faith will supply the want of sight: it realizes both the danger and the security, and with a clear idea of the force of the enemy confidently answers, "Fear not, for they that be with us, are more than they, that be with them." May God give us this faith, and especially strengthen it in the time of danger, and in the hour of death! But if we are "strong, we should bear the infirmities of the weak," and both encourage and pray for them.—Increasing experience of the Lord's power and love, and those glimpses of heavenly things with which his people are favored, gradually embolden them to walk by faith, and not by sight: nor is the power of prayer less, than it was in those ages of miracles, though the Lord answers it in a different way.—It is a mercy to be kept from gross crimes even by ignorance and blindness; and we may pray, that our enemies may be so bewildered and confounded, as to fail of accomplishing their malicious

CHAP. VII.

Elisha predicts great plenty in Samaria, and the death of an unbelieving lord, 1, 2. Four lepers venture into the Syrian camp, and bring word that it is entirely deserted, a terror from God having driven away the army, 3—11. Jehoram fears a stratagem, sends messengers to examine, and finds the report true, 12—15. The people spoil the Syrian camp; the predicted plenty takes place; and the unbelieving lord, having charge of the gate, is trodden to death, 16—20.

THEN [a] Elisha said, Hear ye the word of the LORD, Thus saith the LORD, [b] To-morrow about this time shall [c] a measure of fine flour be sold for a shekel, and two measures [d] of barley for a shekel, in the gate of Samaria.

2 Then * a lord, on whose hand the king leaned, answered the man of God, and said, Behold, [e] if the LORD would make [f] windows in heaven, might this thing be? And he said, Behold, [g] thou shalt see it with thine eyes, but shalt not eat thereof.

3 And there were [h] four leprous men at the entering in of the gate: and they said one to another, [i] Why sit we here until we die?

4 If we say, [k] We will enter into the city, then the famine is in the city, and we shall die there: and if we sit still here, we die also. Now therefore come, and [l] let us fall unto the host of the Syrians: [m] if they save us alive, we shall live; and if they kill us, [n] we shall but die.

5 And they rose up [o] in the twilight, to go unto the camp of the Syrians: and when they were come to the uttermost part of the camp of Syria, [p] behold, there was no man there.

6 For [q] the LORD had made the host of the Syrians to hear a noise of chariots, and a noise of horses, even the noise of a great host: and they said one to another, Lo, the king of Israel hath hired against us [r] the kings of the Hittites, and [s] the kings of the Egyptians to come upon us.

purposes. The gospel itself indeed often occasions the blindness and obduracy of obstinate unbelievers to increase: (Note, 2 Cor. 2:14—17.) yet we must pray for them, and persevere in our endeavors to win them over to be friends to us and to the Lord. We should also watch for opportunities to shew our friendly disposition towards them; as well as to convince them, that they will be ruined by their own iniquities, if they persist in them.

V. 24—33.

The regard which wicked men pay to the servants of God, when they seem to favor them, is frequently turned into bitter enmity under their troubles.—In extreme distress, if they recollect that their affliction is from the Lord, that rage against him, which vents itself in blasphemies, dictates also cruelty against his people. They blame any one as the cause of their calamities, rather than condemn themselves and renounce their sins. If rending their clothes, without a broken and contrite heart; and if wearing sackcloth, without being "renewed in the spirit of their mind," would avail, they would not refuse these external tokens of humiliation: but, while their own impenitence alone retards the deliverance, they excuse their proceeding to still more desperate measures, by avowing, that it is in vain to "wait for the LORD any longer."—Alas! what miseries has sin entailed upon mankind! Little do we know what extremities we may be called to endure in this world: what then will be the everlasting wrath of God against his enemies, in the world to come? But if we are reconciled to him, he will help us when all human help fails; in the time of famine we shall be satisfied, and in peril we shall be safe: whilst all the curses of God's book will fall upon the head of presumptuous transgressors. Let us then "seek first the kingdom of God:" let us be thankful for our daily bread, and not contract habits of self-indulgence, nor set our affections on earthly objects: and may the whole word of God, being truly believed, combine to increase in us reverent fear and holy hope, that we may be "stedfast and unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, knowing that our labor is not in vain in the Lord."

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1. This chapter is a continuation of the subject of the preceding: and immediately as Jehoram had spoken the profane and desperate words before considered, Elisha, in his presence and before the whole company, gave the merciful assurance contained in this verse. The measure here spoken of is supposed to have contained about a peck, or two gallons; and the prices specified, no doubt, were those of plentiful times: but that corn should be sold so cheap in Samaria, on the morrow, was impossible to any power, but that of God. Jehoram however, notwithstanding his rage and desperation, was induced to wait one day longer, to make trial of the prophet's words. (Notes, 6:25,31—33.)

V. 2. This lord was one of the king's most intimate friends, who waited on his person. It is probable that he was an idolatrous despiser of JEHOVAH and his prophet; and perhaps he wanted to persuade Jehoram, that Elisha amused him with the promise of an impossibility, to preserve himself from immediate death.

Thou shalt see, &c.] 'A just punishment of his 'unbelief. And such will be the portion of those, 'that believe not the promise of eternal life.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 3. While the weightier matters of the law were generally neglected, and idolatry prevailed, the prescribed rule about the exclusion of lepers seems to have been rigorously observed. (Notes, Lev. 13:45,46. Num. 5:1—4.) These men resided in tents without the wall; but probably they were admitted within the gate, at the times when horses, and their asses, even the camp as it was, [x] and fled for their life.

8 And when these lepers came to the uttermost part of the camp, they went into one tent, and did eat and drink, and carried thence silver, and gold, and raiment, and went and [y] hid it; and came again and entered into another tent, and carried thence also, and went and hid it.

[Practical Observations.]

9 Then [z] they said one to another, We do not well; [a] this day is a day of good tidings, and we hold our peace: if we tarry till the morning-light, [*] some [b] mischief will come upon us: now therefore come, that we may go and tell the king's household.

10 So they came and called unto [c] the porter of the city: and they told them, saying, We came to the camp of the Syrians, and, behold, there was [d] no man there, neither voice of man; but horses tied, and asses tied, and the tents as they were.

11 And he called the porters; and they told it to the king's house within.

12 ¶ And the king arose in the night, and said [e] unto his servants, [f] I will now shew you what the Syrians have done to us. They know [g] that we be hungry; therefore are they gone out of the camp to [h] hide themselves in the field, saying, When they come out of the city, we shall catch them alive, and get into the city.

13 And [i] one of his servants answered and said, Let some take, I pray thee, five of the horses that remain, which are left [†] in the city, (behold, they are as all the multitude of Israel that are left in it: behold, I say, [k] they are even as all the multitude of the Israelites that are consumed:) and let us send and see.

14 They took therefore two chariot-horses; and the king sent after the host of the Syrians, saying, Go and see.

15 And they went after them unto Jordan: and, lo, all the way was full of garments and [l] vessels, which the Syrians [m] had cast away in their haste. And the messengers returned and told the king.

16 And the people went out, and [n] spoiled the tents of the Syrians. So a measure of fine flour was sold for a shekel, and two measures of barley for a shekel, [o] according to the word of the LORD.

17 And the king appointed [p] the lord on whose hand he leaned, to have the charge of the gate: and [q] the people trode upon him in the gate, and he died, as the man of God had said, who spake when the king came down to him.

18 And it came to pass [r] as the man of God had spoken to the king, saying, Two measures of barley for a shekel, and a measure of fine flour for a shekel, shall the Syrians made their assaults. Gehazi is by some supposed to have been one of them, by which means he became acquainted with the king. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 8:4—6.)

V. 6, 7. The infatuation, which seized the minds of the whole Syrian army, was equal to the illusion put upon their senses. Probably, by the ministration of angels, noises were made resembling those of a very large army with numerous chariots and horsemen marching speedily, and ready directly to fall upon them at once, while they were unprepared for battle. But the excessive terror must have been caused immediately by supernatural influence on their minds. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 19:7. Ex. 15:14—16. Deut. 2:24,25. 1 Sam. 14:11—15.) It is not known who the kings of the Hittites were, or where they reigned. (Note, Judg. 1:22—26, v. 26.) Indeed the whole of the supposition was improbable; and in their trepidation the Syrians left even their horses, which might have accelerated their flight!

V. 8, 9. Having satisfied their hunger, and secured as well as they could a rich booty, they began to reflect upon their conduct. They were conscious of having not acted properly, in respect of the distressed inhabitants of the city; and were afraid, lest some evil should come upon them. if they further delayed to make known the good tidings to those concerned.—Some mischief would befal them: either some judgment from God; or some punishment from the magistrates, for prolonging the miseries of the people. (9. marg.)

V. 12. If Jehoram had firmly expected that Elisha's words would be verified, he would have concluded that this event was the effect of a miraculous interposition in his favor; though he might properly have taken every prudent precaution against a surprise. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 1.) But he seems to have had little expectation of that kind, notwithstanding all the miraculous interpositions of God, by means of the prophet, in his behalf.

V. 13, 14. This person strenuously urged in favor of his counsel, that these men and their horses would be no more exposed, than those who remained in the city. Many had been already consumed, and all the rest must die with hunger in a few days, if no relief were afforded: and they might as well be cut off in examining the real state of the Syrian camp, and discovering what had become of the besiegers, as perish tamely and timidly in the city.—It seems, only two horsemen were sent; perhaps no more horses being found fit for the service; or the king would venture no more out of the city.

CHAP. VIII.

The Shunammite, by Elisha's advice, to avoid a famine of seven years, goes to sojourn in Philistia, 1, 2. On her return, she applies to the king, who is conversing with Gehazi on Elisha's miracles; and he restores her land, 3—6. Elisha goes to Damascus: Hazael is sent by Ben-hadad to inquire of him concerning his sickness: he predicts Hazael's cruelty to Israel, as destined to be king of Syria, 7—13. Hazael murders Ben-hadad and succeeds him, 14, 15. Jehoram reigns wickedly in Judah, 16—19. Edom and Libnah revolt, 20—22. Jehoram is succeeded by Ahaziah, who reigns wickedly, 23—27. V. 16—20. The people being extremely hungry, and vehemently eager for food, thrust down this nobleman, whilst he attempted, perhaps in a harsh manner, to restrain them from rushing out to plunder the Syrian camp: or, as some think, to regulate the market, which was held at the gate and supplied from the camp. Thus he was trodden to death; and the truth and justice of God were clearly seen in that event. (Notes, 1,2.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

In extreme distress unexpected relief is often preparing: and, whatever unbelievers may imagine, it is not in vain to wait for the Lord, how long soever he seems to delay his coming.—No temporal deliverances and mercies will eventually profit sinners, except they are led to repentance; and in that case, "where sin hath abounded, grace will much more abound."—We are all prone to judge of God's promises by human probabilities, and to limit his power of performance by our capacity of discerning how it can be done; and whatever increases pride and self-confidence proportionably augments this propensity. Hence the rich, the noble, the wise, and the learned of the world, have generally been the most backward to implicitly crediting the sure testimony of God, and expecting promised mercies in the way of his appointment, and in single dependence on his power, truth, and love, without regarding those apparent impossibilities which lie in the way. But all those, who persist in despising either his promised blessings, or this method of obtaining them, will see the felicity of believers without partaking of it. For, though he will pardon the infirmities of his people's faith, while they pray, "Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief;" yet he will not spare those, who harden themselves and others in rebellion, through their infidel objections and enmity against the truth, however they may enjoy the confidence of earthly princes, or the admiration of mankind.—Men reason justly in their secular concerns: the least probability of preserving life is preferred to certain death, and the lowest condition is considered as better than perishing by hunger. Yet, in the concerns of their souls, they will not be so convinced, even by demonstration, as to bestow pains and put themselves to inconveniences, to escape the wrath to come and obtain eternal life. But the awakened sinner fears an evil infinitely worse than death; and under the greatest discouragements, even when tempted to despair, he learns to argue, 'If I go on in sin, or sit down 'in sloth, or run into worldly dissipation, or have 'recourse to superstitions, or attempt to establish 'my own righteousness, I must perish. The mercy 'of God in Jesus Christ is my only refuge. If I 'cast myself at his feet and wait his time, who 'knows but he may save me? And if at last he 'spurns me, I can but be lost. All else is com- 'paratively worthless: if then I must perish, I 'will perish under the means of grace, and sup- 'plicating his mercy and salvation.' (Esth. 4:16.) In like manner the believer, exposed to the terrors of persecution, reasons with himself: 'If I 'am faithful to the Lord, I can but die, and he 'will give me the crown of life: but if I deny 'Christ through dread of death, he will refuse to 'acknowledge me another day: and I "fear him 'who is able to destroy body and soul in hell," 'more than those, "who can only kill the body."' Thus believers venture themselves into the Savior's hands, and cleave to him with purpose of heart; whilst others neglect or forsake him.—The Lord can effect his designs by various methods: a terror from him can drive men from their purpose, as effectually as the destroying sword of vengeance; (Note, 19:35.) and we absolutely depend upon him for the due exercise of our senses and faculties, as well as for the continuance of our lives, and the salvation of our souls.—While some, when life is at stake, readily relinquish all which they before held dear; others, when wearing away by incurable or loathsome disease, are as rapacious of gain, as if their lives were secured to them with every other requisite for enjoyment! (Note, 5:26,27.)

V. 9—20.

Natural humanity, and fear of punishment, are powerful checks on the selfishness of the ungodly, and tend to preserve some order and regularity in the world. Those however, who have found "the unsearchable riches of Christ," will not delay to report the good tidings to others, that they may partake of that blessedness, which is sufficient for all: and from love to him they will gladly communicate their temporal good things to their brethren.—True faith consists with prudent precautions: but unbelief suggests endless and unreasonable suspicions, and puts away those blessings, which are brought nigh to the soul, by the invitations and promises of God. The believer, on the other hand, makes trial of them, and experience confirms his faith: and a change, immensely more felicitating than that which is here recorded, takes place in his state, prospects, comforts, and character. But every word of God, concerning judgment as well as mercy, will speedily be accomplished; and earthly honors will accelerate the ruin of the ungodly. May God help us seriously to inquire, whether we are now exposed to his awful threatenings, or interested in his exceedingly great and precious promises; that so we may profit by the warning, or by the encouragement, resulting from that knowledge of our own state and character, compared with the warnings, and promises of the holy Scriptures.

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1, 2. This famine seems to have been sent in the latter part of Jehoram's reign, as a punishment of the pertinacious idolatry of both king and people, notwithstanding the miracles which they had witnessed, and the mercies which they had experienced. (Am. 7:4.) It continued twice as long as that in the days of Ahab, but was not so extreme. (Note, 1 Kings 17:1.)—Elisha was warned of its approach, and counselled his benefactress, now, as it appears, left a widow, to remove till it was over. (Notes, Gen. 12:10. 26:1—5. Ruth 1:1—5.) There was measure of plenty in the land of the Philistines, whilst Israel was visited with famine: but either they could spare none to sell to their neighbors, or their old enmity made them unwilling to do it. They did not, however, molest such as went to sojourn among them.—Had not Judah also felt the effects of the famine, it is likely that this pious woman would have gone thither to sojourn.

V. 3. As this pious woman firmly believed the words of Elisha, predicting the famine, and acted accordingly; so, when the seven years assigned for its continuance were ended, she returned into her own land, in confidence that the famine would then terminate.

To cry, &c.] Either the lands of the Shunammite had been seized, as forfeited to the crown by her emigration; or some of her neighbors or relations had violently seized upon them; or those, to whom she had left the management of her affairs, would neither restore her estate, nor come to account concerning the profits of it. She had therefore at this time occasion to apply to the king, though not formerly; (Note, 4:13.) and it was commendable in Jehoram, that he was accessible to such a claimant.

V. 4—6. (Notes, 5:20—27.) It was not unlawful to speak to a leper, provided it was done without touching him; and Jehoram, from curiosity, was willing to converse, concerning Elisha's miracles, with so mean a person as Gehazi was; who likewise bore an infamous character, and was covered with a loathsome disease! yet he did not court the prophet's acquaintance, because he disliked his counsels and admonitions, and dreaded his warnings and rebukes. The Lord, however, thus prepared his mind to do this pious woman justice; and his providence is especially to be noted in the singular coincidence of apparently casual events, from which most important consequences frequently follow.

V. 7, 8. The prophet doubtless was divinely directed to go to Damascus. Some suppose that he went to counsel and encourage Naaman; and others, that he retired thither during the famine. Some indeed think that he went to anoint Hazael; but it is probable, that Elijah had performed that service, though Hazael, being young and destitute of power to seize on the kingdom, seems not to have much regarded the transaction. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 1 Kings 19:15—17.) Benhadad, however, was no longer disposed to injure Elisha. The report of the prophet's miracles had excited respect and veneration for him, and perhaps his sickness had softened his mind; so that he welcomed him to his capital, and, according to the custom of the day, sent his chief minister to inquire of him concerning his recovery (Notes, 1:2. 1 Kings 14:1—4.) It would have been far more rational to request the instruction and prayers of "the man of God."

Syria hath sent me to thee, saying, Shall I recover of this disease?

10 And Elisha said unto him, Go, say unto him, Thou mayest certainly recover: howbeit [b] the LORD hath shewed me that [c] he shall surely die.

11 And he settled his countenance [*] stedfastly, until he was ashamed: and the man of God [d] wept.

12 And Hazael said, Why weepeth [e] my lord? And he answered, Because I know [f] the evil that thou wilt do unto the children of Israel: their strong-holds wilt thou set on fire, and their young men wilt thou slay with the sword, and wilt [g] dash their children, and rip up their women with child.

13 And Hazael said, But what, is thy servant [h] a dog, that [i] he should do this great thing? And Elisha answered, [k] The LORD hath shewed me that thou shalt be king over Syria.

V. 9. We may infer from the silence of Scripture, that the prophet accepted of this royal present, which must have been of very great value, as the provision which the Lord assigned him in a foreign country, and to enable him to assist the poor Israelites, and the sons of the prophets in their poverty and distresses. (Note, 5:15,16.)

V. 10. Ben-hadad's disease was not of itself mortal, though his life was near its end from another cause. But the prophet either did not know, or did not think it proper to inform Hazael, what that cause would be.—The Hebrew text however is, "Thou shalt not surely recover," or live; "for the LORD," &c. though ancient expositors, both Jews and Christians, adopting the reading of the margin, render it as it stands in our version: and indeed this appears to be the true reading; as the prophet's answer was probably intended to be obscure and ambiguous.

V. 11. The prophet fixed his eyes on Hazael so stedfastly, and for so long a time, that Hazael was confounded; and Elisha himself, in the foresight of Hazael's wickedness, and of the miseries of Israel, burst into tears. (Note, Luke 19:41—44.)

V. 12, 13. Hazael felt at that time no inclination to the brutal ferocity and cruelty of which Elisha spoke; and he wondered that the prophet should suppose him capable of tearing and devouring, like some fierce and greedy dog, rather than a rational creature. But Elisha answered, "The Lord hath shewed me, that thou shalt be king over Syria:" Or, "The Lord hath made me to see thee king over Syria." And when advanced to the throne, being engaged in war with Israel, and exasperated by their resistance, he would be tempted to cruelties, of which at present he had no thought. (Note, Jer. 17:9,10.) Some indeed think Hazael only meant, that he was too inconsiderable a person for such great exploits: but his high rank under Ben-hadad would have enabled him to perform them, had his passions been sufficiently excited; and he was evidently startled at the mention of the cruelties, which the prophet predicted would be perpetrated by him. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Am 1:3—5.)

V. 14, 15. Hazael misreported Elisha's answer having doubtless already formed the intention o murdering Ben-hadad, and seeking an opportunity of effecting his purpose. By the method that h employed of murdering him, he prevented an alarm, or any marks of violence appearing on th body.—Elisha's intimation might give Satan a occasion of suggesting this villany to Hazael; bu it was not the cause of his crime, and formed n excuse for it. Had he been of David's disposition he would have waited in the path of duty, till th Lord had performed his word, in that manne which pleased him. (Notes, 1 Sam. 24:4—7. Kings 11:37. 12:2,3,26—29.) Thus he soon man ifested the rapacity and cruelty of the dog, o which he desired to be thought incapable. (Notes 12,13. Is. 56:9—12. Mic. 3:5—7.)—It is supposed that Ben-hadad had no son; that Hazael was i great favor with the people, and with the arm especially; and that, for a time at least, he escaped the suspicion of having murdered Ben-hadad.

V. 16, 17. Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat began to reign with his father before the death c Ahab, so that Ahaziah the son of Ahab died i the second year of his reign, or in the eighteenth of Jehoshaphat. About five years after he seem to have been more solemnly admitted to the exercise of the royal authority, within two years of hi father's death. This took place when Jehoram was thirty-two years old, and from that time h reigned eight years; though he reigned only fiv or six, as sole king after the death of his father (Note, 1:17.)

V. 18. The daughter, &c.] Perhaps Jehosha phat hoped by thus marrying his son to Ahab' daughter, to cement a peace between the tw kingdoms. and to bring back the Israelites to th worship of God at Jerusalem: but it was an un hallowed measure, and produced a contrary effec

Perhaps he was hindered by the re-olt of Libnah; (Note, 2 Chr. 21:8—11.) and by ears of further insurrections in his own kingdom, here he was become extremely odious. Thus he prophecy of Isaac was fulfilled, after Edom ad been subject to Israel about a hundred and ifty years: nor did the Jews again acquire the ominion over Edom, till long after the Babylo-ish captivity. (Marg. Ref. y. a. Note, Gen. 27:9,40.)—Jehoram was buried in Jerusalem, but ot in the sepulchres of the kings. (Notes, 2 Chr. 1:12—20.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

Temporal deliverances are only respites, and, Sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee," s a warning of universal application. (Note, John 5:10—14.)—When the Lord calls for judgments; amines, pestilences, wars, tempests, and earth-uakes, obey his word: and if he contends he will overcome; for he will prolong the affliction, and make it more and more severe, until the sinner be either humbled or destroyed. (Note, Lev. 26:24.) When he "rendereth a fruitful land barren for the wickedness of them that dwell therein," he takes care of the remnant of his people, and abundantly recompenses their kindness to his servants for his sake; and they will also gladly embrace opportunities of requiting their benefactors, especially by their counsels and prayers: but open enemies sometimes escape better, than hypocrites or apostates.—Where the moral law of God is not violated, a real necessity will justify many deviations from the letter of ritual appointments: but believers will not choose to reside longer among ignorant and ungodly people than is needful, even when they behave kindly to them; but gladly return to the ordinances of God, and the communion of the saints. (Notes, Ruth 1:4—10.)—We know not what changes await us: we may soon be deceived by those who have hitherto been faithful to us, and need the help of those on whom we have not heretofore had any dependence.—The love of worldly riches induces men to various methods of fraud and oppression, and breaks through the most powerful obligations, or the strongest relative ties. Hence the benefit of magistracy, to preserve equity and order among mankind. Believers may, on important occasions, avail themselves of their privileges as members of the community; provided they are not actuated by covetousness or resentment, do not manifest a contentious spirit, and make no appeal in a doubtful cause, or in matters of no great importance: (Note, Matt. 5:38—42.) and rulers should award justice without respect of persons, and compel the injurious to restitution.—But the Lord himself will plead the cause of the defenceless and the op-

A young prophet, by Elisha's orders, goes to Ramoth-gilead; anoints Jehu as king over Israel, and directs him to extirpate Ahab's family, 1—10. Jehu acquaints the captains, is proclaimed king, and marches in haste to Jezreel against Joram, 11—16. Joram sends messengers to Jehu, who detains them, 17—20. He and Ahaziah meet Jehu: who kills Joram, and casts him into the field of Naboth, 21—26. Ahaziah is slain at Gur and buried at Jerusalem, 27—29. pressed, of the fatherless and the widow: he often effects his purpose by influencing the hearts of princes in their favor; and the most casual or trivial incident, which conduces to it, may prove an occasion of exciting praise and gratitude for his providential goodness.—The gratification of curiosity is more pleasing to the carnal mind, than the mortification of worldly lusts: and hypocrites, apostates, or profligates, on some occasions, will be pleased with conversation on religious topics, provided they have no reference to their own conscience, character, or conduct. (Notes, John 4:16—20. P. O. 16—26.) Thus they countenance each other in ungodliness, or buoy up presumptuous hopes: whilst they cannot endure the instructions, and will not imitate the example, of those teachers whom they most profess to admire.

V. 7—15.

The Lord can procure his people a welcome, and spread them a table, even amidst their enemies; who, on some occasions, and especially in affliction, may be inclined to shew them great kindness and respect. Yet few, even in that case, derive real benefit from their instructions, and disposition to do them good: but some honor redounds to God, and outward advantages accrue to his servants; who may without scruple receive them, as from him, when they are not required to flatter, or in any other way to act inconsistently with their profession.—Those who love God and man, must often weep upon a survey of the wickedness and misery of mankind: and a particular foresight of the state of the church, and of the world, would augment their sorrow. But little are men, when not exposed to temptation, aware of the desperate wickedness of their own hearts! They do not conceive themselves capable of those enormities, to which at present they feel no inducement; and it is deemed an insult upon them to suppose they are. But when the powerful attraction of great imaginary advantages approaches the carnal mind, the latent depravity begins to move; and they will surely come into contact, unless hindered by external obstructions, or by the power of God upon the heart. Then, the greedy dog, the ravening wolf, the subtle fox, the poisonous serpent, or the filthy swine, form feeble emblems of human depravity: the persons, who before were most inoffensive, become guilty of far greater rapacity, treachery, or cruelty, than the worst of these animals; and in their cooler moments doubtless often reflect with horror and astonishment at their awful progress. Those who, as mortified limbs, are continually cut off from the body politic, once no more thought of such criminality and condemnation, than any reader of these observations: and we are any of us capable, if left to ourselves, of the worst crimes perpetrated by the vilest pests and scourges of the world! This should remind us, "not to be high-minded but to fear," and to trust only in the Lord to preserve us from the deceitfulness of our own hearts. As the desire of greatness is a dangerous temptation, which has induced many to perpetrate the basest crimes; so power, however obtained, generally alters men's manners for the worse: and their inclinations to vice commonly increase, in proportion as they are able to commit it, without control, and with impunity. We ought therefore to be content and thankful in more obscure situations; and those, who are called to this dangerous pre-eminence, have need of double watchfulness and fervency in prayer.—When iniquity is conceived in the heart, means will be devised for its perpetration: and flattering language often clokes the most malignant purposes: for sinners in general are satisfied with concealing their crimes from man, regardless of the all-seeing eye of God.—It is, in every case, an awful cruelty to flatter those with the hope of life, whom we suppose to be near dissolution: because they ought to be preparing for that important change, and to be counselled and warned so to employ their few remaining days or hours.

V. 16—29.

When pious men choose wives for themselves, or take any measures in the marriage of their children, they should remember that their remote posterity are concerned, and that an improper choice may entail misery and ruin upon them.—Indulged children seldom prove wise or good men; and it is not often expedient to advance young people, needlessly and prematurely, to authority. Inferiors and dependents are often employed to chastise our rebellion against God, by their ill behavior to us. He will not, however, break his promise or forsake his cause: but, whilst wicked men, from generation to generation, perish in their sins, the Son of David, the Light of his church, and of the world, ever lives to protect, bless, and comfort his people. May all the changes, troubles, and wickedness of the world, make us more earnest in securing an interest in his great salvation!

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1. Elijah, many years before, had been commissioned to anoint Jehu, as a king of a new family, immediately appointed by God to reign over Israel, and to execute vengeance on the family and adherents of Ahab. (Note, 1 Kings 19:15—17.) But, a respite having been granted that prince, when he externally humbled himself before God, it seems, the anointing of Jehu was deferred likewise: (Note, 1 Kings 21: 27—29.) so that this service now devolved on Elisha, as Elijah's successor and representative. But it required secrecy, and it was not proper he should perform it in person: as one of "the sons of the prophets," who was little known, might have a far better opportunity of escaping, if suspected by Jehoram's friends.—Elisha lived above forty years after this: (Note, 13:14.) and, probably, was not incapacitated by age or infirmities, for the labor and activity required on this occasion, but was for other reasons induced, or directed, to send a deputy. (Marg. Ref.)—When the ancients used great expedition, they girded up the skirts of their long upper garments with a girdle round their loins. (Note, 1 Pet. 1:13—16.)

V. 2, 3. Jehoram having retired from the army, (8:29.) Jehu seems to have been left first in command, having been long employed by Ahab's family. The directions given this young prophet were explicit; especially as to the secrecy to be observed, and the measures to be adopted for his own safety. (Marg. Ref.) The service was indeed peculiarly perilous; and Samuel had used caution, in a measure much less offensive. (Note, 1 Sam. 16:1,2.)

V. 5—10. Jehu was engaged in converse or consultation with the other captains, when thus addressed by a person, it is probable, of mean appearance: yet when the young prophet said, "I have an errand" (or a word) "to thee, O captain," he readily went aside with him to learn his business. And immediately the prophet anointed him, explained the meaning of that transaction, and gave him an express commission from God. In all this, no doubt he exactly adhered to his instructions. (Marg. Ref. n—s.)—Israel, though generally idolatrous, was still "the people of the LORD." They were called by his name, and had a remnant of his worshippers among them: and Jehu was thus warned to use his authority, in obedience to God, and to promote true religion. The family and adherents of Ahab were criminals condemned by the supreme Judge; Jehu was appointed to execute the sentence; the kingdom was his recompense for the service: and, as far as he acted according to the instructions given him, he needed not fear contracting guilt, or regard any reproach or opposition to which he might be exposed. The murder of the prophets and worshippers of God was more insisted upon, in this indictment, than even the worship of Baal. Jehoram had been spared many years, but he continued impenitent; though not so wicked as Ahab, who was punished in his posterity. Jezebel had retained her authority, and persisted in idolatry, and in her enmity to JEHOVAH and his servants; though less spoken of in the reigns of her sons, than in that of her husband. Long space had been given her, but she had not repented; and her measure of iniquity was now full, and her awful doom most expressly denounced. (Marg. Ref.—35,36. Notes, 1 Kings 21:23. Rev. 2:20—23.)

V. 11. This mad fellow.] It is probable, that there were some peculiarities in the young prophet's manner and address, which made the captains conclude that he was one of the "sons of the prophets," and speak of him in this language; and some reference might be had to those vehement actions, which the prophets sometimes used, when influenced by the Spirit of prophecy: (Note, 1 Sam. 19:19—24.) but it seems rather to have resulted from profane contempt of religion, as it may be supposed they were generally idolaters. Indeed, without excepting him who "spake as never man spake," those, who have faithfully delivered the Lord's message to sinners, have in all ages been treated as madmen. (Marg. Ref. y.) They are so indifferent about those objects, which attract the senses, and which man naturally desires and pursues; and so engaged about those things which are invisible, and therefore generally neglected as if unreal; their judgment, conversation, maxims, and conduct are so contrary to those of other men; and they venture and endure so much, in pursuit of interests and objects of which others have no conception; that worldly men naturally conclude them to be mad, when they deem them honestly in earnest. (Notes, Mark 3:20,21. 2 Cor. 5:13—15.) The charge however is often brought in self-defence: for, admitting the principles and practice of the devoted servants of God to be reasonable, wise, and necessary to happiness, the inference is undeniable; that the ambitious, the sensual, the covetous, the dissipated, the worldly, and the ungodly of every description, are fools and madmen to all intents and purposes.

Ye know, &c.] Perhaps Jehu meant, that the captains knew the man to be a prophet; and must suppose that he came to admonish and instruct him: or he might intend to evade the question, as if the prophet's errand had nothing peculiar in it: but they would not be thus satisfied, knowing that something more was communicated now. And he said, [z] Thus and thus spake he to me, saying, Thus saith the LORD, I have anointed thee king over Israel.

13 Then they hasted, [a] and took every man his garment, and put it under him on the top of the stairs, and [b] blew with trumpets, saying, Jehu * is king.

14 So Jehu the son of Jehoshaphat, the son of Nimshi, [c] conspired against Joram. (Now Joram had [d] kept Ramoth-gilead, he and all Israel, because of Hazael king of Syria.

15 But king † Joram was [e] returned to be healed in Jezreel of the wounds which the Syrians ‡ had given him, when he fought with Hazael king of Syria.) And Jehu said, If it be your minds, then let § none go forth nor escape out of the city, to go to tell it in Jezreel.

16 So Jehu rode in a chariot, and went to Jezreel; for Joram lay there. [f] And Ahaziah king of Judah was come down to see Joram.

17 And there stood [g] a watchman on the tower in Jezreel, and he spied the company of Jehu as he came, and said, I see a company. And Joram said, [h] Take an horseman, and send to meet them, and let him say, [i] Is it peace?

18 So there went one on horseback to meet him, and said, Thus saith the king, Is it peace? And Jehu said, [k] What hast thou to do with peace? turn thee behind me. And the watchman told, saying, The messenger came to them, but he cometh not again.

19 Then he sent out a second on horseback, which came to them, and said, Thus saith the king, Is it peace? And Jehu answered, What hast thou to do with peace? turn thee behind me.

20 And the watchman told, saying, He came even unto them, and cometh not again: and the ‖ driving is like the driving of Jehu the son of Nimshi; [l] for he driveth ¶ furiously.

21 And Joram said,  Make ready. And his chariot was made ready. And [m] Joram king of Israel and Ahaziah king of Judah went out, each in his chariot, and they went out against Jehu, and †† met him in [n] the portion of Naboth the Jezreelite.

to him. This is the common interpretation.—It may, however, be questioned, whether Jehu did not suspect, that the young prophet acted in concert with the captains; and that they were previously acquainted with the man and his communication.

V. 12, 13. When the captains urged Jehu further, he declared the business of the young prophet, with a frankness and boldness, which seem to have arisen from a divine energy on his mind; for, if the captains had not coincided with him, the discovery might have proved fatal to him. Some kind of faith in the word of God, spoken by the prophet, seems to have animated him to this hazardous undertaking, of which it does not appear that he had had any previous intention: and the minds of his companions also were surprisingly disposed to concur with him, by making him a kind of throne, and proclaiming him king with sound of trumpets. It is probable, that this was done on the top of some edifice, from which the people were generally informed of such public transactions, as were proper to be communicated to them. Thus the conspiracy was openly avowed. While Jehoram had rendered himself odious by his crimes and oppressions to the nation in general; it may be supposed, that he was also unpopular in the army, through his severity and cruelty.

V. 14. It is evident that Ramoth-gilead was at this time in the hands of the Israelites: (15) but it is not certain, whether they had just taken it; or whether Hazael had raised the siege of it, having attempted in vain to retake it.—Jehoram's absence from the army proved of fatal consequence to him: he "escaped the sword of Hazael, but Jehu slew him." (1 Kings 19:17.)

V. 15—17. (8:28,29.) Jezreel lay at a considerable distance from Ramoth-gilead, with the river Jordan between. Yet Jehu concerted his plan with such prudence, and executed it with such despatch; his adherents came so cordially into his interests, and so faithfully kept his counsel; and the people in the neighborhood were either so ignorant about his intentions, or so regardless of them; that Jehoram received no tidings of his march, till Jehu's distant approach was perceived by the watchman! But the matter was of the Lord, and could not fail of success.

I see a company. (17) A troop, or army, as the word שְׁפִיעָה signifies.

V. 18, 19. Perhaps Jehoram feared, lest the Syrians had obtained the victory over his troops, and driven them away from Ramoth: but Jehu, by compelling his messengers to turn behind him, prevented his obtaining any information, and increased his perplexity.

V. 20. Furiously.] Some have rendered this, He driveth slowly. But Jehu was a vehement man, yet keen and sagacious, a fit instrument for his peculiar work. His approach might be seen at a great distance from a watch-tower, as he came with an armed force; and it is most probable, that he travelled with as much celerity as he could.—The original word is exactly rendered in the margin, in madness; being from the same root as that above translated, mad fellow. (11)

V. 21. Jehoram had no sufficient force to oppose Jehu's army, and he seems to have acted rashly in going out to meet him. But he still dreamed of peace, and was impatient to know, whether Jehu returned defeated by the Syrians, or triumphant over them. Thus Jehu's design was facilitated, and perhaps bloodshed prevented: and thus, according to the purpose of God, Jehoram was slain in the portion of Naboth; probably near the place, where he and his sons had been put to death. (Notes, 25,26. 1 Kings 21:17—19.)

V. 22. Idolatry is in scripture called whoredom; and, when committed by the professed people of God, adultery, to denote the Lord's abhorrence of it. Jezebel's idolatries had been manifold and long continued; and, as some think, attended by prostitution, according to the shameless practices of the Gentiles in their worship: of Jezebel's personal character in this respect nothing further is recorded. (Notes, Rev. 2:20—23. 14:8. 17:1, 2.) The words, witchcrafts, may allude to the fascinating artifices that harlots use to allure men to wickedness; by which her various methods of seducing the Israelites to idolatry seem to be intended. For this purpose she doubtless employed promises, presents, caresses, and flatteries; and on the other hand, frowns, threats, and persecutions; by which great multitudes were induced to conform to her religion, and join in her spiritual whoredom. As Jehu had been long unsuspected, in the court of Ahab and his sons, he probably had never before in any way protested against the worship of Baal.—Jehoram was answerable for Jezebel's crimes, because he countenanced and imitated them, instead of using his authority to repress them. V. 23, 24. Marg. Ref.—Note, 1 Kings 22:32—35.

V. 25, 26. In the vineyard of murdered Naboth, of which Jehoram seems to have kept possession, his body was left unburied, to be devoured by dogs, or beasts of prey: and the dogs, in some sense, licked the blood of Ahab, as flowing from the wounds of his son. (Note, 1 Kings 21: 17—19.)—The words of the prophets were called burdens, as predicting a heavy burden of misery to the guilty party, which he could neither endure nor remove. (Marg. Ref. t.—Note, Jer 23:33—40.)—It is probable, that Jehu had seldom reflected on Elisha's words during the intervening years, till these events brought the substance of them fresh to his recollection.

Rode together. (25) Ahab's 'guard were wont 'to ride in pairs, two and two; and Jehu and Bid-'kar rode at that time together, and heard Eli-'jah's words.' Bp. Patrick.

The blood of his sons. (26) This evidently implies that Naboth's sons were put to death along with him: for to suppose, that the words only mean that they were deprived of their estate, and so impoverished, and as it were starved, is altogether unreasonable. (Note, 1 Kings 21:8—14.)

V. 27, 28. Ahaziah was Ahab's grandson by Athaliah; and being also an idolater, he was within Jehu's commission. So that, being found with Jehoram, he shared his punishment; though, as son to pious Jehoshaphat, he was allowed an honorable burial. The circumstances elsewhere recorded concerning his death, render it probable, that he was not slain, till Jehu had inflicted vengeance on Jezebel at Jezreel. (Notes, 30—37. 2 Chr. 22:7—9.)

Garden-house. (27) It seems, that Ahab, notwithstanding Elijah's awful message to him, and his external humiliation, proceeded with his plan of forming Naboth's vineyard, or part of it, into a garden of herbs; and this house is supposed to have been built on it, for the accommodation of those who kept it. (Notes, 1 Kings 21:1,2,27—29.)—Died there.] Ahaziah was taken at Megiddo, and brought to Jehu, who slew him, probably at Jezreel. But he died with the others of the house of Ahab, which is supposed to be here meant.

V. 29. Jehoram began to reign over Judah, in the fifth year of Jehoram king of Israel; it is probable, in the very beginning of it: and he died, and was succeeded by Ahaziah, in the eleventh or twelfth year of Jehoram; that is, the close of the eleventh, or beginning of the twelfth. This space is called eight years, as comprising six whole years, and a portion of two others, computed according to the reigns of the kings of Judah. (Marg. Ref.)

30 ¶ And when Jehu was come to Jezreel, [e] Jezebel heard of it, and she * painted her face, and [f] tired her head, and looked out at a window.

31 And as Jehu entered in at the gate, she said, Had [g] Zimri [h] peace, who slew his master?

32 And he lifted up his face to the window, and said, [i] Who is on my side? who? And there looked out to him two or three † eunuchs.

33 And he said, [k] Throw her down. So they threw her down: and some of her blood was sprinkled on the wall, and on the horses; [l] and he trode her under foot.

V. 30—37. Jezebel had no way of escaping or resisting Jehu: she therefore aimed to outbrave and intimidate him. Instead of assuming the habit of a mourner, or a suppliant, she arrayed herself in all the magnificence of royalty, and stationed herself in a conspicuous place to wait his arrival. She used the method, customary in the east, of giving herself a majestic appearance, by a kind of paint which dilates the eye-brows, and makes the eyes look large and bright. And when Jehu approached the place, she accosted him by saying, "Had Zimri peace, who slew his master?" Zimri had destroyed the house of Baasha, and had soon after fallen before Omri the father of Ahab: (Note, 1 Kings 16:8—19.) but Zimri had had no commission for what he did; and Jehu was expressly ordered to take vengeance on the house of Ahab. He was not therefore to be thus intimidated: for finding upon inquiry, that her chamberlains were ready to join him; (being either mercenary men who were willing to purchase his favor, or being weary of Jezebel's imperious and haughty disposition;) he ordered her to be thrown from the window, and thus she was dashed to pieces, and trodden under foot by the horses. 'See how suddenly courtiers 'change with the fortune of their master.' Bp. Patrick.—Afterwards, when he thought of burying her, in honor of her royal extraction, he found himself disappointed; for her mangled body, (having probably been plundered of its costly attire,) was entirely torn in pieces and devoured by dogs. This reminded him of the word of the Lord by Elijah, which he had before forgotten: and he observed that her carcass was to become as dung upon the face of the earth.—This was a dreadful and most ignominious end, worthy of one who had been such a curse to Israel and Judah, but had brought the heaviest curses upon herself; and who was a specimen, and in some respects a type, of all ringleaders in idolatry, and tempters to that crime. Yet "this cursed woman," the daughter of a king, was also the wife of a king, the mother of two kings, the mother-in-law of a king, and the grandmother of a king, all in her own life! So vain are all earthly honors and distinctions!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

The long-suffering of God enhances the condemnation of those, who are not led by it to repentance. (Notes, Rom. 2:4—6. 9:22,23.)—In his appointed time he will raise up and qualify suitable instruments for performing his purpose, whether of vengeance or of mercy.—The faithful servants of God must stand prepared for arduous and perilous undertakings: and obedience to his commandments must have the precedency before all other duties. But, as the written word is at present our only rule of duty, it seldom happens, that we are required to act, even in apparent violation of our relative obligations to princes, parents, masters, or other superiors; except in professing those truths, and attending on those ordinances, which they may disapprove, discountenance, or prohibit; or in keeping aloof from those superstitions, or worldly places and practices, which they would enjoin.—Yet if, after all endeavors "to render honor to whom honor is due," we should be reproached or ill-treated for our conscientious obedience to God, we must bear it with meekness and patience: (Notes, Acts 4:13—22, v. 19,23—28. 5:29—31,41,42.) and when in danger of persecution, we are allowed to flee from it. They, who are employed as ministers, will be the most exposed in these respects: for the message of the Lord, meeting sinners in the midst of their worldly pursuits, singles them out, by an application to their hearts and consciences, as if they were addressed by name: (Note, 2 Sam. 12:7.) and while some are thus separated from their companions, and, by the unction of the Holy Spirit, prepared for the service of God; others are marked out, in the midst of their prosperity, as in danger of eternal misery. Whilst, however, we conscientiously adhere to our instructions, we shall be accepted, and preserved as long as is really good for us.

V. 11—29.

Every man should well consider, to what work the Lord calls him, and in what manner and for what ends he ought to do it. His special commission justifies the severest executions of his enemies: but our general instructions to do good, and to bless, and to overcome evil with good, point out to us more delightful services, in which we should thankfully abound from day to day. Yet the vengeance of God will fall with peculiar weight upon the head of those that oppress and persecute his people and ministers; who may deem themselves highly favored, if they are only reviled, and reproached as fools and madmen. Satisfied with the testimony of their conscience, and the Lord's gracious acceptance, they may

Jehu, by letters to the elders, causes Ahab's seventy sons to be slain at Samaria, and their heads to be brought to Jezreel, 1—7. He shews this to be a fulfilment of Elijah's prophecy, and destroys all Ahab's kindred in Jezreel, 8—11. In his way to Samaria he slays forty-two of Ahaziah's brethren, 12—14. Attended by Jehonadab, he slays all that remained to Ahab in Samaria, 15—17. He assembles all the worshippers of Baal by stratagem; puts them to death, and breaks down Baal's images and temple, 18—28. rejoice and be exceedingly glad, at being thus ranked with prophets, apostles, and the Savior himself: and instead of resenting the opprobrious terms, as an intolerable affront, may glory in them as a most honorable distinction. (Notes, Matt. 5:10—12. 1 Pet. 4:12—16.) They should, however, be extremely careful to avoid all ridiculous and unreasonable words and actions, that they may give no just occasion to such malignant and injurious charges; which, when unmerited, cannot possibly injure them, except they make them angry, contentious, discontented, or reluctant to their duty.—The Lord often secretly disposes men to concur in his designs, in a manner contrary to their former conduct, and to all human probabilities: and then such events, as would otherwise have been impracticable, are speedily and easily accomplished: and, to ask advice, is often the readiest way of obtaining concurrence and assistance. Prudence, united with vigor and despatch, promises success in the most arduous designs; and a disposition to "drive furiously," may sometimes fit a person for peculiar services, which would not so well suit the temper of more sedate and amiable persons: yet in general it is no commendation of a man's character, or qualification for the most desirable kinds of usefulness.—While sudden destruction is rapidly approaching, sinners are still saying, Peace, peace: but what peace can there be to the impenitent workers of iniquity, and to those who have tempted others to join them in rebellion against God? —Notorious sinners entail judgment on their posterity unto the third and fourth generation, especially when these walk in the steps of their progenitors.—The circumstances of temporal judgment are sometimes remarkably calculated to call to remembrance the crimes for which they are inflicted: so that the most superficial observers must perceive the justice of God in them, and acknowledge that the Scriptures are fulfilled. How will it then be in "the day of wrath, and the revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who will render unto every one according to his works?" And if we would escape the destruction of the ungodly, we must avoid all intimate acquaintance with them; for "a companion of fools shall be destroyed."

V. 30—37.

Some haughty transgressors have so long prospered in their crimes, and domineered over all around them, that they suppose they can outbrave all opposition, and defy even the justice of God himself. Their hearts grow more hardened and insolent, when they are evidently upon the brink of destruction: and an unhumbled spirit, in alarming and humiliating circumstances, is a distinguishing mark of those, who "are appointed unto wrath."—They who carefully adorn their persons "by painting the face," "tiring the hair, and putting on of apparel," whilst their souls are polluted with the guilt and defilement of innumerable, unrepented, unpardoned, unmortified iniquities, should sometimes turn aside to view themselves in this mirror, and to contemplate the conduct and fate of Jezebel: especially those who use these arts to seduce others from the ways of truth and righteousness. Such persons, however noble, wealthy, beautiful, or successful, are emphatically accursed; under the curse of God themselves, and the cursed instruments of bringing others into the same condemnation.—Persons of royal extraction or authority, naturally annex the idea of sacred to their distinctions; yet they often pay no regard to the sacred service and honor of the King of kings: but how can they expect the conscientious obedience of their subjects, whilst they are in a state of actual rebellion against their Sovereign; and attempting to corrupt the morals and principles of the people? Indeed traitors are justly execrated, and seldom prosper: but the Lord often uses them as the instruments of his righteous vengeance against ungodly princes.—Court-favorites are commonly a fickle, time-serving people. For the sake of emolument, they are very assiduous and lavish in their flatteries: but when a revolution takes place, they often betray, or even murder, the same unhappy persons, to secure themselves, or to obtain still greater preferment! This is especially to be feared by those, who render themselves odious through insolence and wickedness; and who are only served out of slavish fear or mercenary hope.—Let proud tyrants and oppressors study this chapter with fear and trembling: the loftiest will be brought low, and every one of them, in his turn, must give an account unto God, with whom "is no respect of persons." The anguish of Jezebel's death, and the disgrace of her mangled limbs, faintly shadow forth the misery and contempt, which at and after death will be the portion of those, who have been "the terror of the mighty in the land of the living;" whose very memory shall rot in infamy. This the believer will foresee and expect; and at length all the world shall witness it with astonishment. May we flee from that "wrath which is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men;" and seek to secure an

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1—7. These seventy persons were Ahab's descendants by several wives, probably including the sons of Jehoram. They resided at Samaria, as a more secure situation than Jezreel: or, as some think, they fled thither from Jezreel, when Jehoram was slain: attended by the rulers or elders of Jezreel, who might be supposed most attached to the interests of the family; and by those who had superintended their education. Doubtless, many of the elders were the same persons, who had put Naboth and his sons to death in obedience to Jezebel; and, their consciences and principles having been debauched by such services, they were equally ready to murder the family of Ahab at Jehu's command. (Note, 1 Kings 21:8—14.) Jehu seems to have been aware of their base disposition; and he wrote letters to them, that by killing the young princes by their hands, he might avoid odium, and prevent further bloodshed, and forward the completion of his purpose: for as Samaria was strongly fortified, and defended by a much more powerful garrison than Jezreel; it might have stood out against him for a long time, and at last have been reduced with great difficulty, if the princes had courageously defended it. He was indeed commissioned to destroy all the house of Ahab, and he was not at all scrupulous about the means of doing it: otherwise he would have hesitated at employing men to serve him, with such base treachery and murder. But regardless of this, he, by an intimidating challenge, assured them, that if they attempted to protect their royal charge, the matter must be decided by the sword. He knew their strength, and he would have them to be aware of his resolution. As, however. they did not fear the vengeance and power of God, but the courage and success of Jehu, whom they despaired of resisting, they unreservedly submitted to him. Nor did they, when they received his second letter, so much as beg that others might be appointed to slay the young princes; but, as it seems, without reluctancy, at the first word, beheaded them all. Doubtless they had brought them up delicately, repeatedly avowed their attachment to them, and bestowed many flattering encomiums upon them. (Note, 9:30—37.) They probably expected a reward from Jehu; but they seem to have been slain among the other adherents of Ahab's family. (17)—Most of these princes must have been grown men, though some might be minors or children.

V. 8—10. The heads of Ahab's sons, having been laid in a place of public concourse, would occasion much amazement and many inquiries; which gave Jehu an opportunity of addressing the multitude on the subject. He meant to abate the odium of his own conduct towards the family of Ahab, by contrasting it with the atrocious treachery and cruelty of these professed friends, who had been so entirely confided in by Ahab and his family. At the same time he reminded them, that the whole was a performance of the word of the Lord by Elijah, which would receive a still more exact completion: instead, therefore, of condemning the persons employed in this bloody work, they ought to adore the truth and justice of God, and submit to his will. Thus he likewise avowed his purpose of going on with what he had begun: but, as the commission given him by the prophet was not publicly known, he did not mention it. (Notes, 9:5—10, 25,26. 1 Kings 21:17—26. Hos. 1:4,5.)

V. 11. Priests.] These seem to have been the priests, or prophets, of Baal and other idols, who had eaten at Jezebel's table, and who presided over all the others. As they were strongly attached to Ahab's family, Jehu may be supposed to have put them to death from reasons of state, rather than from zeal against idolatry.

V. 13, 14. All the sons of Jehoram, the father of Ahaziah, had been slain by the Philistines, during the life of Jehoram; (Notes, 2 Chr. 21:16—20. 22:1.) but these persons seem to have been the sons of Ahaziah's brethren, or his nephews. They belonged however to the family of Ahab, and fell within Jehu's commission. (Marg. Ref. x.) They supposed Jehoram and Jezebel to be still living in prosperity, and were going in a company to see them: and thus they met their doom, and were slain by Jehu.

V. 15, 16. (Notes, Jer. 35:) Jehonadab was eminent for his cordial attachment to the worship of JEHOVAH, and for a life of strict piety, and deadness to the world. Having therefore heard that Jehu was executing the predicted vengeance upon the house of Ahab, he seems to have entertained hopes of a thorough reformation, and was desirous of giving his cordial support to so good a work: and he went to meet Jehu, who, with apparent piety, pronounced a blessing upon him; inquiring whether he met his sincere affection with reciprocal cordiality. (Marg. Ref.) Indeed some think, that Jehonadab first blessed Jehu, as Jacob had blessed Pharaoh; and that then Jehu addressed him. (Note, Gen. 47:7.) Being, however, satisfied with Jehonadab's answer, he took him up into his chariot; secretly elated, as it seems, with the concurrence of so pious a person, and expecting by his influence to acquire the full confidence of the people. But, had he intended effectually to reform religion, he would doubtless have sent for Elisha, to counsel him and concur with him; and his neglect, in that particular, was no favorable indication of his designs. He seems to have ostentatiously boasted of his "zeal for the LORD," and wanted to have it noticed: (Notes, Num. 24:16. Prov. 27:2.) but in reality he was influenced by carnal policy, united with a temporary conviction, and not by genuine, pious zeal.

V. 17. The rulers and elders of Samaria readily allowed Jehu and his company to enter the city, and surrendered all its strong holds and forces up to him: but as no exception is mentioned, when, it is said, "He slew all that remained unto Ahab in Samaria;" it is generally and probably concluded, that he slew the traitorous rulers and elders also. Many love the treachery, who despise or detest the traitors; and none, when their purpose is answered, afterwards trust them. (Note, Matt. 27:3—5.)

V. 18—20. The kings of Israel, who had seized the throne by conspiring against their predecessors, had commonly imitated or exceeded their idolatry; and this gave plausibility to Jehu's stratagem: but it was a measure which cannot be justified or at all excused. It would have been sufficient, if he had destroyed the temples and images of Baal, and put to death the known abettors and ringleaders of his worship, and every one who should afterwards attempt to revive it. But to draw them into a snare, by a direct falsehood, and to tempt them to commit idolatry, that he might slay them in the very act, was "to do evil, that good might come;" and resembled the abhorred maxim of those who maintain, that faith is not to be kept with heretics. (Notes, Josh. 9:19,20. 2 Sam. 13:22—29. Rom. 3:5—8.)

V. 21. Numbers doubtless had been drawn in to bow the knee to Baal, in order to obtain the favor, or escape the displeasure of their rulers, who did not cordially approve of that idolatry, though indifferent about the worship of JEHOVAH. And these would keep away till Jehu's intentions were more manifest: but the zealous idolaters were judicially infatuated, and attended. Their number must have been small, compared with the state of things in the first days of Elijah: but Jehoram was not so zealous for the worship of Baal, as Ahab had been; and the incessant labors of Elisha, and the sons of the prophets, must have produced very great effects.—Some expositors,

24 And when they went in to offer sacrifices and burnt-offerings, Jehu appointed fourscore men without, and said, [t] If any of the men whom I have brought into your hands escape, he that letteth him go, his life shall be for the life of him.

25 And it came to pass, as soon as he had made an end of offering the burnt-offering, that Jehu said to the guard, and to the captains, [u] Go in, and slay them; [v] let none come forth. however, think that by the servants of Baal, (as in the original,) his worshippers in general are not meant, but the persons who ministered to the prophets and priests of Baal, as the Levites and Nethinims did to the sons of Aaron.

V. 22. Vestments.] The prophets, priests, and servants of Baal wore distinguishing garments, in which they were accustomed to perform their religious services. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Zeph. 1:4.)

V. 23. None of, &c.] This was spoken in a dissembled zeal to preserve the purity of the worship of Baal: but had not the idolaters been judicially infatuated, they must have suspected some design concealed under such a precaution.

V. 24, 25. (Note, 1 Kings 20:41,42.) Perhaps, all the servants of Baal were not collected, nor all others separated, till the sacrifices were placed upon the altar; and therefore they were permitted to go through with their worship.—We may suppose that Jehonadab so much approved the substance of Jehu's service, that he was willing to allow for the informality with which it was performed: otherwise he certainly could not approve of his dissimulation, or his attendance on an idolatrous sacrifice with apparent satisfaction. When the captains and men, employed by Jehu, had slain all the priests and servants of Baal, within the precincts of the temple, (which a small company of armed men might readily do, some watching at the gates to intercept those who attempted to escape, and others entering sword in hand among a defenceless confined company;) and had made themselves sure that they were all dead, by casting out their bodies; they hastened to "the city of the house of Baal" to complete Jehu's design. For it seems that the buildings around the temple of Baal and the courts of the temple, which had been erected for the accommodation of his priests and their attendants, were so numerous, as to form a kind of city by themselves.

V. 26, 27. Marg. Ref.—A draught-house. (27) The citizens thenceforth made a practice of carrying all the filth and rubbish of Samaria to that place, in contempt and abhorrence of the idolatry, which had been there committed. (Marg. Ref. z.)

V. 28. After this, the worship of Baal does not appear to have ever been restored in the kingdom of Israel, though other idolatry abounded.

V. 29—31. Had Jehu acted from genuine zeal for the honor of God, in destroying the worship of Baal, he would also have put down the worship of the golden calves; that idolatry being as expressly forbidden by the second, as the other was by the first commandment. But that was a politic and profitable sin, and it appeared dangerous to attempt any thing against it. In his general conduct also "he took no heed to walk in the law of the LORD ... with all his heart," so that his religious zeal was partial, politic, and selfish. The Lord, however, sent a prophet to assure him, that h had done right, in executing vengeance on Ahab' family, as well as in destroying the worship of Baal; and to promise him a suitable recompense. Accordingly, his family sat on the throne of Israel longer than any other family did, either before or after; as the fourth generation reached to above one hundred years from the time when Jehu ascended the throne. (Notes, 15:8,12.) Yet, in other respects these very actions of Jehu were deemed deserving of punishment. (Note, Hos. 1:4,5.) The repetition used concerning Jeroboam, "who made Israel to sin," emphatically shews the extreme criminality of his conduct in the sight of God, as thus opening the way, and setting the example, for all the idolatries of Israel, till that kingdom was subverted. He was, in some respects, answerable for the whole.

V. 32—36. Hazael smote that region, which lay east of Jordan: but he did not desolate it: this was afterwards done by the kings of Assyria. (Note, 1 Chr. 5:25,26.) At this time he committed those barbarities which Elisha had predicted, and we may suppose that the miseries of Israel were very great. (Notes, 8:12,13. Am. 1:3—5.) But from the period, when Jehu ceased to do the work assigned him by God, his actions and might are no further noticed in sacred Scripture, and the account of his reign is very compendious. (*Marg. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

How soon are the most flourishing families and kingdoms desolated, when God arises to execute his judgments!—Such as bequeath his blessing to their children in answer to their prayers, and as a gracious recompense of their faith and charity, provide in a far better manner for them, than those who leave estates to their descendants, burdened with the indignation of the Lord, for their injustice, oppression, and impiety.—The selfishness of the human heart gives peculiar energy to those temptations, which powerfully assail their hopes and fears as to this life. Where this principle has the ascendency, men may be induced to such treachery and cruelty, as before they never thought of: and those, who influence their inferiors to practise iniquity for them, need not to be surprised if they commit similar crimes against them. But nothing, except faith, fear of God, love to his name, and the hope of eternal life, can give a decided victory over all temptations; and enable us to obey the Lord, and venture all consequences in his service.—Those who have done things really, or apparently evil, are often disposed to draw in others to act in a manner more evidently and grossly iniquitous; and then to conclude, that they shall be acquitted by righteous judges, not being themselves so atrociously criminal. Yet the law of God, and not any conduct of man, is the rule by which our actions are to be judged: and, though tempters generally prove accusers, a moiety of the guilt of every crime perpetrated at their instance, properly belongs to them.—We readily perceive the propriety of submitting where we are unable to withstand, and of taking warning by the examples of those who have in vain opposed the will of earthly princes; at least we are naturally disposed at any price to pacify their displeasure. But are not sinners sensible that they cannot stand against the indignation of the Almighty? And yet they persist in rebellion against him, and will not take proper measures, or make proper submissions, to avert his wrath and recover his favor!—If we call ourselves the servants of earthly potentates, they expect that our obedience to their mandates should evince the sincerity of our professions: and if we are the Lord's, we must shew that we are devoted to him by doing his will; and he never did, nor can, command any thing unjust or unreasonable.—In the most awful transactions however, even though attended by the basest villanies, the truth and justice of God ought to be acknowledged; nay, true faith assures us of them, even when to us imperceptible: for no word of God can fall to the ground, but all will be performed; and then his glory will be conspicuous to the whole world.—We should dread and abhor the man who had murdered our parents or children, the wife of our bosom, or our beloved friends; and who had aimed a dagger at our hearts, and having repeatedly wounded us, still avowed his purpose of assassinating us. But when we look back upon our deceased relatives, or forward to our own dissolution: when we reflect on the sufferings which we or ours endure or fear, or on those miseries which render the earth like one great hospital, slaughter-house, and burying ground; when we consider the innumerable millions of human bodies, which have been consigned to the tomb, and are reverted to the dust; and the immense multitudes daily following: yea, when our believing thoughts make excursions into the invisible world, and survey the miseries of fallen angels, and departed souls consigned to the place of torment: or when we look forward to the resurrection and the final judgment, and view the innumerable millions of the wicked, appalled with horror and despair, attending to the awful sentence, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil, and his angels:" in short, when the aggregate of all the misery in the whole creation, through eternal ages, has been considered, and the question occurs, "Who slew all these?" the answer will be, SIN! TRANSGRESSION OF GOD'S LAW has made all this havoc, and introduced all this misery into his most perfect creation; and, worse than all this, SIN has crucified the LORD OF GLORY. Shall we then lodge this viper in our bosom, and madly seek for happiness from the cause of all possible misery? Rather we should abhor and dread it with that complete detestation, which would render its distant approach more formidable to us than any temporal pain or affliction imaginable.

V. 15—36.

Men of eminent godliness should countenance every work of public reformation; and wise men will value their presence and assistance. But they are frequently too hasty in their concurrence, and too sanguine in their expectations, when those in exalted stations stand forth as the professed friends of religion: and thus they are drawn in, to sanction those wrong measures which they are unable to prevent, to the discredit of the common cause.—Hypocrites and self-deceivers are often ready to say to eminently pious persons, "Come and see our zeal for the LORD;" when they are only aiming, by the assistance of a party, to establish their own authority and reputation, or other secular interests. And when men's professions are very strong, their progress very rapid, and their zeal tarnished with ostentation, or leavened with subtlety and a fickle or fierce demeanor; they may justly be suspected, and need to be watched and admonished by those, who would avoid subsequent painful reflections. Vehemence and severity indeed were in some measure consistent with the awful executions, which a righteous God commanded in these ancient times: yet the manner, in which his orders were performed, might indicate a very improper spirit. Zeal, however, in the cause of God, is worthless, except it be tempered with humility, meekness, kindness, and a peaceable frame of mind: as, furious contentions and bitter recriminations cannot adorn the gospel, or meet the divine acceptance; for neither the wrath nor the falsehood of man can "work the righteousness of God." (Notes, Luke 9:51—56. Jam. 3:13—18.)—Hypocrites betray themselves by their earnestness about one part of religion, and their indifference about others: and generally profitable or plausible sins are spared, while those, which would injure them with their party are cast off. Yet the church, and the world, may reap advantage from their partial obedience: and God will not remain as it were indebted to them; but will recompense their external services with external rewards, and at the same time visit their sins with deserved punishments. Much more then will he recompense the upright services of his believing people, who may be encouraged by this consideration to abound in his work.—The servants of Satan are often open enough in avowing what master they serve; it is therefore shameful and deplorable, when the servants of the Lord are unwilling that men should know that they are employed by him.—If the wicked could so separate the people of God from their company, as to let none remain in it, we might be sure that destruction was preparing for them: but what blessed ordinances should we have, if no servants of sin and Satan crept in among the worshippers of the LORD! Generally, if not always, we must say, "Ye are clean, but not all." Nay, many are useful to the souls of others, who themselves prove apostates and cast-aways. The Lord grant that this may not be the case with the writer, or any of the readers, of these observations!

NOTES.

CHAP. XI. V. 1, 2. (Notes, 9:27,28. 10:13, 14.) It is probable that Athaliah was left in authority, when Ahaziah went to visit Jehoram: and, being informed that he was slain, she proceeded to destroy "all the seed royal," or the seed of the kingdom; that is, all who could claim the kingdom, as descended from David's royal race. This seems to include all the males whom Athaliah knew to belong to that family, especially in the line of Solomon and Rehoboam, without excepting even her own grand-children by Ahaziah. Some think, an impious revenge actuated her; and that, as God had ordered the family of Ahab, (whose daughter she was,) to be destroyed; so she was determined to extirpate that family which he especially favored. But it is more certain that she was influenced by ambition, and desired to reign without a competitor; and to be able to defend herself against Jehu, by whom she must think herself marked for destruction. By this concurrence of events, Jehoshaphat's alliance with the house of Ahab proved almost the total ruin of his family; and of the house of David, from whence the Messiah was to descend! To appearance, and in Athaliah's intention, it was exterminated; and indeed that branch, which descended from Jehoshaphat, was so interwoven with Ahab's devoted family, that without a favorable construction of the sentence, none of them could have been spared: for Jehoshaphat's other sons had been slain by Jehoram, as soon as he had got possession of the throne, so that all who survived were the descendants of Ahab, as well as of Jehoshaphat. (Note, 2 Chr. 21:4.) But by an act of grace, as it were, Joash, being both a branch of the house of David, and of that of Ahab, was considered as belonging to the former family; and snatched as "a brand from the burning." (Notes, 3:7. 1 Kings 22:1—4.)—Some think that he was left for dead among the other victims of Athaliah's ambition; but being taken away, he revived and was recovered: or else he was removed when they were slaying the others, and either was not sought for, or could not be found. Jehosheba, though the daughter of Jehoram, (whether by Athaliah, or some other wife is not certain,) had been married some time before to Jehoiada the high priest; God thus preparing for the protection of Joash, before the danger became apparent.—Jehosheba concealed Joash in some of the chambers set apart for the use of the priests, within the precincts of the temple, where he remained in safety; Athaliah not suspecting that any male branch of the family survived.

V. 3. It seems that the degenerate race of Judah did not oppose the usurpation of this vile woman! We are informed of nothing respecting Athaliah's conduct, during her continuance in authority, but that she supported the worship of Baal, as a genuine daughter of Jezebel.

V. 4. Jehoiada, as high priest, and as having the lawful heir to the crown under his care, was fully authorized to act on this occasion. Indeed Jehosheba herself had a far better right to the throne, than Athaliah.—All the persons, whom Jehoiada first employed, seem to have been Levites; though others, by their means, were afterwards brought to concur. (Note, 2 Chr. 23:1,2.) For the Levites were numbered, and arranged in companies under their several heads, called captains, or leaders; and they attended upon the service of the temple, in rotation, by weekly courses. (Notes, 1 Chr. 23:2—6. 25:1—6. 26:6—12, v. 6.) These were first informed by Jehoiada, that the king's son was in the temple, and that he intended to place him on the throne: and he proposed to make a solemn agreement with them before God, to which they readily acceded, and bound themselves by oath to fidelity. Perhaps Athaliah's government had grown intolerably oppressive; or Jehoiada perceived that its continuance threatened the destruction of religion: therefore the priests, and the chief of the Levites, as most immediately engaged for the support of that cause, went among their brethren, to prepare their minds to attempt a deliverance.

V. 5—9. The Levites attended in their courses every week; one company coming in at the beginning of the sabbath, and another going out at the close of it. But Jehoiada employed both companies on this occasion; such only excepted, as were necessary to perform the ordinary services.—By "the king's house" some understand the chamber in which Joash resided: others the royal palace, from which there was an entrance into the court of the temple. This was guarded by one division of those who came in on the sabbath to prevent a surprise; another was set to guard "the gate of Sur," or, the foundation; and another to protect the temple and courts from injury; or, as the original may mean, to guard the breach, which had been made in the temple, or its out-buildings. (2 Chr. 24:7.) Others, of those Levites who went out on the sabbath, were stationed to guard the king himself, with orders to slay any one who attempted to come within their ranks. Two-thirds are mentioned of these Levites; as some of them might have urgent calls to return to their families. These arrangements no doubt were supposed suitable, and sufficient to secure the temple from being polluted by the guards or favorers of Athaliah, whilst Jehoiada and his sons were engaged in crowning and anointing Joash. (Notes, 12. 2 Chr. 23:11.)—By employing the Levites almost exclusively, all suspicion was precluded: and, as the throne belonged to the family of David, not only by hereditary succession, but by the special appointment of God; and as these rights, and all the interests of the kingdom of Judah, and even the worship of God, were basely trampled upon by a murderous and idolatrous woman, of the devoted house of Ahab; they were fully justified in these decided measures against her. Perhaps they were likewise assured of the concurrence of the people, when matters were ripe for their interposition.

V. 10. It is probable, that these were arms, which David had taken from his conquered enemies, and dedicated to the Lord, by way of ascribing the honor of his success to him. (Marg. Ref. x.) This tends to confirm the interpretation before given, concerning these captains namely, that they were not military officers, as some suppose; but the leaders of the several courses and companies of the Levites, who did not usually wear the weapons of war. (Note, 4.)

V. 12. Coronation is not before this expressly mentioned, in the appointment of any king either in Judah or Israel; but it seems to have been customary: for the crown, as one of the insignia of royalty, is repeatedly mentioned. (Marg. Ref. b.) No doubt, "the testimony" signifies the book of the law; and Joash was instructed by this significant action, that he received his authority from God, and was accountable to him for it, according to the rule of his word. (Note, Ex. 31:18.) He was also anointed, in token of his divine appointment to the kingdom; as Athaliah's usurpation had interrupted the succession. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1 Kings 1:38,39, v. 39. 1 Chr. 29:21—25.) When this had been done, not only the priests and Levites, but the people who had witnessed the transaction, shouted for joy and clapped their hands, and wished their king life and prosperity. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Matt. 21:8—11.)

V. 13—16. Athaliah, after the manner of her mother Jezebel, instead of fleeing with feminine timidity, when she heard the noise and suspected the occasion; went directly into the temple, unattended by a guard, as if she could by her presence overawe and confound the conspirators: but by this rashness she rushed upon her death. (Note, 9:30—37.)—The people, it seems, were assembled, perhaps to celebrate some of their solemn feasts; and they, with their princes or magistrates, cordially united with Jehoiada, and the priests and Levites. When Athaliah saw Joash stand in the place appropriated to the king's use, she was aware of what had taken place; and expressed her abhorrence of the supposed treason by word and deed, in hopes of inducing the people to take her part. But her conduct had been so odious and unnatural, that none favored her; and at the word of Jehoiada she suffered the punishment due to her complicated crimes. Doubtless, Jehoiada acted in all this business, by the direction and according to the will of God.—It is probable that the Levites executed the sentence; and great care was taken not to pollute with blood the court of the temple.

V. 17—20. Jehoiada embraced this opportunity of engaging the young king and the people, in the most solemn manner, to renew their national covenant with the Lord, that they would worship and serve him alone; as well as perform their reciprocal duties to each other in the fear of God. As the protector and near relation of Joash, he was authorized to act for him, and the whole compact was deliberately ratified, as in the presence of God. (Notes, 23:3. Deut. 29:10—15. Josh. 24:25. 2 Chr. 15:12—15. Neh. 10:1.) When this was concluded, they proceeded to destroy the worship of Baal, which Athaliah had established in Judah; breaking down the idolatrous temple and images, and slaying the priest of Baal at his altars; without imitating or emulating Jehu's subtlety in detecting his worshippers. (Note, 10:18—20.) The people were greatly rejoiced at this happy revolution, and matters were soon brought to a quiet settlement. (Notes, 2 Chr. 23:) Nothing is recorded of the burial of Athaliah; but in every respect she was treated with neglect and abhorrence.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—12.

When the thirst of dominion predominates, it extinguishes both common humanity and natural affection, and steels the hearts of parents, yea of mothers, against their own children or descendants. Nor can the most humane conceive how they should act, if brought within the magnetic influence of powerful temptations, through opening prospects of gratifying ambition and the thirst after power and dignity, united with fear, envy, resentment, or other vehement passions. We should therefore repress the first emotions of this aspiring temper, and pray without ceas-

Jehoash reigns well so long as Jehoiada lives, 1—3. He gives orders that the temple should be repaired; yet the priests neglect the service; but he devises a plan for defraying the expense, and completes the work, 4—16. He gives the consecrated treasures to Hazael, to divert him from assaulting Jerusalem, 17, 18. He is slain by his servants, and succeeded by his son Amaziah, 19—21.

ing to be kept out of the way of temptation. And we may also learn to be thankful to God, for restraining others and ourselves, from acting forth all the desperate wickedness of the human heart, which otherwise would produce effects unspeakably horrid.—What fatal consequences flow from matrimonial connexions, or intimate acquaintance, with atrocious sinners! The mischiefs, which may thus be entailed upon children and remote posterity, cannot be ascertained; and may extend even to the ruin of the interests of true religion, in those places where before it flourished. These reflections should add energy to the Lord's prohibition of these incongruous lliances. Yet, he mixes his severest judgments, pon his professed people and offending servants, with mercy: in the midst of opposition he provides for the performance of his promises: and the extremities, to which his cause may be reduced, are permitted, to illustrate the glory of his power and truth, in preserving and recovering it.—The most successful villany will be short-lived: and, though in that little time dreadful havoc may be made in society, and irreligion or false religion may apparently be established upon the ruins of true godliness; yet, the cause of God cannot be kept down, but, like the fabled Phœnix, it will revive from its ashes with renewed youth and vigor.—One pious man nay, on some emergencies, become an instrument of most extensive good: especially when regard to the glory and worship of God, is united with prudent contrivance and well concerted measures.—In urgent cases, general rules of external propriety may be dispensed with: and ministers ought always to lead the way in opposing the prevalence of wickedness, and in promoting equity, and submission to lawful governors, as well as in promoting true religion.—To what peculiar dangers are those in exalted stations exposed, through the ambition, treachery, and cruelty of men! We may therefore be thankful to be placed with our families in an obscure situation, beneath envy or jealousy.—Princes should be reminded, when intrusted with authority, of their accountableness to God for the use of it: and every opportunity should be embraced to enforce a conscientious regard to his word.

V. 13—21.

Evil will hunt out the wicked to destroy them; and they are often hardened and infatuated to rush upon their own destruction.—The most abandoned, on some occasions, express abhorrence at the supposed crimes of others, especially when committed against themselves: but it is neither treason, nor cruelty, to execute vengeance upon usurpers and parricides, and to restore the authority to its rightful possessor.—As "one sinner destroyeth much good;" so the removal of one ringleader in iniquity may prepare the way for great reformation.—It is our duty to engage ourselves and each other, and all those over whom we have acquired influence, in as firm and solemn a manner as possible, to be the Lord's people: and when we begin with a due regard to religion, relative duties will be the better understood and performed. Yet they should be plainly declared and enforced, without the exception of those which subsist between the prince and people.—The rectifying of scandalous abuses, and the punishment of notorious criminals, form an introduction to the revival of true godliness. External regularity will afterwards more easily be re-established; and the effectual blessing of God may be expected. The way for a people to be joyful and at peace, is to engage cordially in the service of God; for "the voice of joy and thanksgiving, is in the dwellings of the righteous:" but "there is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked."

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 2, 3. Jehoiada acquired such influence over Joash, or Jehoash, by his services and counsels, in his younger years, as retained him in good behavior, so long as he lived to give him advice. But the latter part of his life, after Jehoiada's death, was extremely wicked; and all the good, of his best days, was of that kind which springs from transient convictions, and external influence, or that which hypocrites do to be seen of men. (Notes, 2 Chr. 24:17—26.) His reign, however, should by no means be numbered with those of the worst kings of Judah: for he repressed idolatry, and maintained the worship at the temple; though he did not abolish the irregular worship of God in the high places; which indeed was never done till the days of Hezekiah. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 18:4,22.) Jehoiada lived and retained his influence, during two-thirds at least of the years that Joash reigned.

V. 4, 5. The temple had been suffered to go to decay, during the reigns of Jehoram and Ahaziah, and the usurpation of Athaliah: and her sons, doubtless encouraged by her, had impiously broken down some part of the buildings, to adorn the house of Baal with the most costly materials of the temple; as well as spoiled its consecrated treasures to enrich those of their idols.

B. C. 856. 6 But it was so, that in the * three and twentieth year of king Jehoash [l] the priests had not repaired the breaches of the house.

7 Then [m] king Jehoash called for [n] Jehoiada the priest, and the other priests, and said unto them, [o] Why repair ye not the breaches of the house? now therefore, receive no more money of your acquaintance, but deliver it for the breaches of the house.

8 And the priests consented to receive no more money of the people, neither to repair the breaches of the house.

9 But Jehoiada the priest [p] took a chest, and bored a hole in the lid of it, and set it [q] beside the altar, on the right side as one cometh into the house of the LORD: and [r] the priests that kept the † door put therein all the money that was brought into the house of the LORD.

10 And it was so, when they saw that there was much money in the chest, that [s] the king's ‡ scribe and the high priest came up, and they § put up in bags, and told the money that was found in the house of the LORD.

11 And they [t] gave the money, being told, into the hands of them that did the work, that had the oversight of the house of the LORD: and they || laid it out to the carpenters and builders, that wrought upon the house of the LORD;

12 And to [u] masons and hewers of stone, and to buy timber and hewed stone to repair the breaches of the house of the LORD, and for all that ¶ was laid out, for the house to repair it.

13 Howbeit [x] there were not made for the house of the LORD [y] bowls of silver, snuffers, basons, [z] trumpets, any vessels of gold, or vessels of silver, of the money that was brought into the house of the LORD:

14 But they gave that to the workmen, and repaired therewith the house of the LORD.

15 Moreover [a] they reckoned not with the men, into whose hand they delivered the money to be bestowed on workmen: [b] for they dealt faithfully.

16 The [c] trespass-money and sin-money was not brought into the house of the LORD: it was the priests'.

(2 Chr. 24:7.) But Jehoash, having had his life preserved in the precincts of the temple, seems to have had a strong desire of seeing it restored to its ancient splendor: whilst Jehoiada perhaps was more intent to promote the internal part of true religion.—The money, which Jehoash ordered the priests to collect from the people, seems to have arisen from the sale of such firstlings as were not fit for sacrifice; from the half shekel apiece levied of all the people; from the redemption of things dedicated; from the redemption of those who were vowed to the Lord by a singular vow; and from voluntary contributions. (Marg. Ref. g, h.—Notes, Ex. 13:11—16. 30:11—16. Lev. 27: 2—27.)—As some of these were the dues of the priests, whose incomes must have been greatly diminished by the defection of the ten tribes; that circumstance might render them more disaffected to the business, and negligent in it.

V. 6—12. Jehoash's orders must have been very long neglected; for nothing was done effectually, till the twenty-third year of his reign, or the thirtieth of his life. It is probable, that he priests appropriated considerable sums to their own use, which they received for the repair of the temple; till the people lost all confidence in them, and would give them no more money on that account. Jehoiada himself appears to have been remiss in this affair; but his great age would necessarily render him less capable of active services. (Note, 2 Chr. 24:15, 16.) The priests, however, readily consented to the alteration proposed by Jehoash; and a proclamation having been made for the collection of a half shekel from each male above twenty years of age; (2 Chr. 24:6,9. Note, Ex. 30:11—16.) and a chest so placed, that the money might be either put in by those that brought it, or by the priests in their presence; large sums were soon collected, and applied by Jehoiada and the king's secretary to the repairs of the temple. (Marg. Ref.)—As the chest is said in Chronicles, to have been "set without at the gate," and that the "princes and people cast" the money into it; it has been thought, that the chest was at first placed in the inner court; so that the money still generally passed through the hands of the priests: but that not being satisfactory, it was removed to a situation, where all had ready access to it. (2 Chr. 24:8,10.)

V. 13—15. It seems that orders were given to the workmen, that the repairs of the temple should first be completed, before any vessels were made; though it is probable that these were much wanted: but when the workmen had set the temple "in its state," they punctually brought the surplus of the money to the king and Jehoiada, without requiring to be called to an account; and then such vessels were made, as had been taken away by Athaliah and her sons. (2 Chr. 24:7,14.) The conduct of these workmen was highly commendable; and formed a contrast to that of the remissness and selfishness of the priests and Levites as above noticed.—Silver. (13) Notes, Ex. 25:23—30. Num. 7:13,14.

sacrifice them in their name. And, as they commonly sent more than the sacrifice cost, the surplus became a perquisite, under the name of trespass-money and sin-money. (Hos. 4:8.)

V. 17, 18. Probably, the expedition of Hazael, here intended, is the same as that of the Syrians, which is recorded in Chronicles: (2 Chr. 24:23,24.) and, if so, the success of it, and the calamities brought on Judah by it, were far greater, than this short account seems to describe them. It took place, however, after Jehoash's apostacy; and he made no scruple of spoiling the temple of the remains of its treasures, to purchase Hazael's departure. (Notes, 2 Chr. 24:17—22.)

V. 20, 21. The Syrians left Jehoash "in great diseases:" and his servants, (probably some relations or friends of Jehoiada, who deeply resented the murder of his son Zechariah,) took that opportunity of slaying him.—Joash was buried in the city of David, but not in the sepulchres of the kings; 'because he had forsaken God, and slain 'one of his prophets.' *Bp. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Wise and pious instructers and counsellors are a singular benefit to young persons, especially when called to fill up important stations: and it is a happy case, when they acquire a proper influence, and make an unexceptionable use of it. Indeed, restraining men from outward crimes, and inducing them to external good actions, does not imply conversion of the heart to the love of God, and delight in his holy service: yet it prevents much mischief, and occasions extensive benefit to the community; and often precedes, and is made the means of, men's internal renovation.—A too favorable regard to customary violations of the divine law, and the fear of consequences in making innovations, often influence pious men to let slip the favorable opportunity of effecting still greater good: and, mere formalists have frequently exceeded true and eminent believers, in their active earnestness about the externals of religion: for, in old age especially, they are apt to yield to the love of ease and peace, or to discouragement through reiterated disappointments, and so to become remiss.—The building or repairing of convenient places for divine worship falls peculiarly within the sphere of princes and nobles; and, if done from a proper principle, it is a good work which will not lose its reward: yet many abound in such useful services, whose "hearts are not right in the sight of God."—Too often have nominal ministers been convicted of seeking their own interests, rather than those of religion. As a body, they must be suspected; and therefore should carefully avoid the appearance of this evil, lest they lose the confidence of the people, and become useless and contemptible. (Notes, Mal. 1:9—11. 2:4—9.) It is most grievous, that the disinterested fidelity and punctuality of tradesmen and mechanics should shame the mercenary conduct of priests: or that the activity and zeal of laymen should expose the lukewarmness and indifference of the clergy! These things are not the fault of the ministerial office, but of human nature, which that office will not change. The collective body is placed in a conspicuous station, and their faults are not easily concealed: and, as more is expected from them than from others, they meet with less allowance, and indeed their misconduct admits of less excuse. It is therefore most for their own credit and comfort, and for the honor of their profession, to stand aloof from those concerns in which large sums of money are employed. (P. O. John 12:1—8. 2 Cor. 8:16—24.) At least all works of piety and charity should be so managed, that those who contribute to them, may be assured their money is honestly and prudently expended: and they deserve commendation, who are faithful in such matters.—May the Lord preserve us from the disgraceful and wretched doom of the hypocrite and apostate! May our "hearts be sound in his statutes;" and may our "path shine more and more unto the perfect day!"

years, Joash might have entered on his twenty-third year, when Jehu died and was succeeded by Jehoahaz.

V. 3. All their days.] Or, "all his days;" for there is nothing answering to their in the original; and Joash the son of Jehoahaz delivered Israel from Ben-hadad. (22—25.)

V. 4, 5. Jehoahaz, while he deprecated the wrath of God, and entreated the removal of his heavy judgments, seems not to have attempted any reformation. If, however, this took place towards the conclusion of his life, his faith and repentance might not have time to produce their genuine fruits: and this is probable; for the deliverance, in answer to his prayer, was not granted till the reign of his son Joash, the "savior" or deliverer, here spoken of; as it appears from the subsequent narration.—Yet some think Joash began to deliver Israel during the life of his father. (22—25.)

V. 6. Either the grove, which Ahab had dedicated to Baal, was still used in idolatry, or another was prepared for that purpose. (1 Kings 15:13. 16:33. Notes, 17:16. Deut. 16:21.)

V. 7, 8. Jehoahaz seems to have defended himself valiantly against Hazael, though without success: this might provoke the cruelty, which Elisha had foretold; and it eventually increased the miseries of Israel. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 8: 12,13. 10:32—36. 1 Sam. 13:13—15.)

V. 10. The seventeen years of Jehoahaz reach to the thirty-ninth or fortieth year of Joash king of Judah; but Jehoash of Israel began to reign in the thirty-seventh year of Joash of Judah: Jehoash must therefore have reigned some time along with his father.

V. 12. Notes, 14—19. 14:8—14. 2 Chr. 25:17—24.

V. 14. If Elisha was called to follow Elijah, no more than seven years before the death of Ahab; and if he died as soon as Joash mounted the throne, he prophesied at least sixty-six years! but many think that this took place towards the close of the reign of Joash. From the beginning of the reign of Jehu to Elisha's sickness and death, (that is, at least, for more than forty-five years,) his name is never once mentioned; but without doubt he was very usefully employed, especially in superintending the schools of the prophets. There is ground to conclude, that great numbers were converted to God by his labors; though the bulk of the nation conformed to the idolatry established by authority. (Note, 10:21.) Neither Jehu nor Jehoahaz paid any attention to the prophet: yet they were not persecutors, and probably they respected his character. Being, however, em-

16 And he said to the king of Israel, Put thine hand upon the bow. And he ut his hand upon it: and [e] Elisha put his ands upon the king's hands.

17 And he said, [f] Open the window astward. And he opened it. Then lisha said, Shoot: and he shot. And e said, [g] The arrow of the LORD's deverance, and the arrow of deliverance om Syria: for thou shalt smite the yrians in [h] Aphek, till thou have conumed them.

18 And he said, Take the arrows. nd he took them. And he said unto the ing of Israel, [i] Smite upon the ground. nd [k] he smote thrice, and stayed.

19 And [l] the man of God [m] was wroth ith him, and said, Thou shouldest have nitten five or six times; then hadst thou nitten Syria till thou hadst consumed it: hereas [n] now thou shalt smite Syria but rice.

20 ¶ And Elisha died, and they [o] buried m. And [p] the bands of [q] the Moabites invaded the land at the coming in of the year.

21 And it came to pass, as they were burying a man, that, behold, they spied a band of men; and they cast the man into the sepulchre of Elisha; and when the man [†] was let down, and [r] touched the bones of Elisha, he revived, and stood up on his feet.

22 ¶ But [s] Hazael king of Syria, oppressed Israel all the days of Jehoahaz.

23 And [t] the LORD was gracious unto them, and had compassion on them, and [u] had respect unto them, [x] because of his covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and would not destroy them, [y] neither cast he them from his [‡] presence as yet.

24 So [z] Hazael king of Syria died; and Ben-hadad his son reigned in his stead. [B. C. 839.]

yed in state-affairs, and determined to main- n the idolatry of the golden calves, they were t disposed to hearken to his admonitions: and he pressed his disapprobation of their conduct by eping at a distance. (Notes, Eph. 5:8—14. 2 es. 3:6—9.) But when Joash heard that he was parently near death, at a time when Israel was ought very low by iniquity, he seems to have nsidered the dispensation as a divine rebuke; d, under the prevalency of present convictions, visited and lamented over him, in the very rds which Elisha had used when Elijah was noved; (Note, 2:12.) acknowledging him to be chief defence of Israel, whose death would re expose them to ruin, than all Hazael's sucses. Yet we read of nothing, in the character conduct of Joash, to warrant a conclusion, t this was more than a transient impression on his mind, which soon wore off without proing any abiding good effect.

V. 15—19. In this prophetical transaction, the of the "bow and arrows" denoted that Joash s to be the instrument of Israel's deliverance, military valor and enterprise: the prophet's diting the king in shooting, and laying his hands on his, implied that he was to follow the direcn of the prophet, and that God would give him cess. The arrow shot eastward, marked the nation of the place where the deliverance was be wrought, and intimated that the eastern sts of the land of Israel would be rescued from king of Syria; (Note, 10:32—36.) though his minions, which lay chiefly to the north of Can, would not be taken from him: and the smit- of the arrows upon the ground was significant the use that Joash would make of his first vicy, by which his enemies were cast down to the ound before him, whether he would effectually crush their power, or imitate the impolitic lenity of Ahab. (Notes, 1 Kings 20:31—43.) Probably Joash was not informed that his victories would equal the times, which he smote with the arrows: and perhaps considering the action as trivial and unmeaning, he smote but thrice, which displeased the prophet, and, as it were, limited the king's successes. His conduct expressed the state of his mind, as not firmly believing the words of the prophet, or not duly valuing the promised deliverance. (25)

In Aphek. (17) Aphek was near to Philistia to the west of Samaria: (Marg. Ref. h.) but a decisive victory over Hazael and the Syrians, in that place, made way for Joash's rescuing the regions towards the east out of their hands.

V. 20, 21. 'They laid the body by Elisha's, for 'fear, if they proceeded to the sepulchre prepared 'for this man, they should fall into the hand of the 'Moabites. ... God restored him, in an instant, to 'perfect health: for he stood upon his feet; and, it 'is likely, walked home with those who brought 'him to be buried.' Bp. Patrick.—This extraordinary miracle, wrought by the touch of the dead body of Elisha, (which by the ritual law could only render a man unclean,) declared that he was as much beloved as Elijah, though he had not been translated; and that the Lord was his God, after death as well as before; and thus intimated both the immortality of the soul, and the final resurrection of the body. It might also intimate, that many mercies were reserved for Israel, in answer to Elisha's prayers, and in consequence of his labors for them in his life-time. (Notes, Luke 20:27—38, v. 36. Acts 5:12—16. 19: 8—12.)

V. 23. The reason here assigned, for the deliverance granted to Israel, seems to imply that which he had taken out of the hand of Jehoahaz his father by war. [z] Three times did Joash beat him, and recovered the cities of Israel.

CHAP. XIV.

Amaziah reigns well, yet not like David, 1—4. He justly punishes his father's murderers, 5, 6. He gains a victory over Edom, 7. He rashly challenges Jehoash king of Israel, and, obstinately persisting, is vanquished and taken prisoner by him; the wall of Jerusalem is broken down, and the treasures of the temple spoiled, 8—14. Jehoash dies, and is succeeded by Jeroboam, 15, 16. Amaziah is slain by conspirators, 17—20. His son Azariah is made king, and builds Elath, 21, 22. Jeroboam's wicked reign, 23, 24. He restores the coast of Israel, 25—27. He dies and is succeeded by his son Zachariah, 28, 29.

there was nothing either in Joash, or his subjects, (except their miseries,) to induce the Lord thus to favor them. (Marg. Ref. t—y.) The deliverance was granted, not from regard to the covenant ratified at mount Sinai, which had been grossly violated; but out of respect to the covenant ratified with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, long before the entrance of the Mosaic law. (Notes, Lev. 26:41—45.) Nor was the success of Joash any thing more, than a respite for the present from the judgments which impended over them. (Notes, 4,5. Judg. 10:15,16.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

"The LORD is slow to anger and of great mercy;" yet he will by no means acquit obstinate transgressors; and his just anger is the cause of all human misery. When deep affliction excites a cry for deliverance, he will hearken; for he is gracious and compassionate, and delights in mercy, and can speedily give a deliverance out of every trouble. But if he answer the mere cry of distress for temporal relief, much more will he regard the prayer of faith for spiritual blessings: and, as he so long remembered his covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and spared the posterity for the sake of their pious ancestors, notwithstanding their manifold provocations; much more will he remember Jesus and the covenant which he mediated, and for his sake pardon the abundant transgressions of all, who by true faith stand in a spiritual relation to him. All other privileges and distinctions can only avail to retard the deserved vengeance: the Lord may not destroy sinners, or cast them from his presence "as yet;" but without being "partakers of Christ" the Savior, they must at length perish.—The true believer, though chastened for his transgression, shall not be left to perish for ever: but being "delivered from the hand of his enemies, he shall serve God without fear, in righteousness and holiness, before him all his days."—Wicked men prosper in their schemes, till the Lord's purposes respecting them are accomplished; and then they are removed, or ruined, without any difficulty.—There is such excellency in true and eminent godliness, that it often excites the esteem and respect of those, who cleave to their sins. Persons even of this character, while under convictions, will feel and acknowledge, that the servants of God are their best friends, and the most valuable part of society. But this language of conscience is soon silenced by the clamorous voice of their passions.—Some parts of the lives of eminent believers are more conspicuous than others; but in the general tenor of them, they aim to glorify God and do good to man. Yet the most devoted will be ashamed, that they have not been more earnest; and the most useful must regret, that the world has received so little benefit from them. Indeed, reflection on the prevalence of wickedness and misery, on every side, with the prospect of still more dreadful judgments upon all the workers of iniquity, must fill the heart of every pious and benevolent man with deep concern.—Yet the good seed, which faithful ministers sow in their life-time, may spring up after their death; and they may often take encouragement from the prospect of their prayers being answered after they are removed: yet their removal is frequently the signal for calamities to break forth; as the recal of an ambassador precedes a declaration of war. However, living or dying, the true people of God are blessed, and blessings to others: and those who, like the Savior, pass through death and the grave to glory, are not less favored, than if they were immediately received up to heaven in the body.—But the death and burial of Jesus alone has efficacy to disarm the king of terrors of his power to hurt, and to sanctify the tomb, as a safe repository for the believer's body, till the general resurrection. Through him all blessings come from a reconciled God to believing sinners: if we use his appointed means in the obedience of faith, and be not straitened in our desires and expectations of help from him, through unbelief, we shall not be straitened in him, but shall be "able to do all things through Christ who strengtheneth us." Then shall we beat down our enemies, and trample them as the mire in the streets, till our deliverance be complete, and our rejoicing in the Lord abundant. May he give us strong faith, that our hearts may be established and comforted; and that we may greatly glorify his name, and be serviceable to his people on earth, in our way to the heavenly inheritance!

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. V. 1. Joash king of Israel began to reign about four years before Amaziah king of Judah: but he is supposed to have reigned part of the time with his father Jehoahaz; and Amaziah succeeded to the throne of Judah in the second year after the death of Jehoahaz king of Israel. Yet, as Amaziah survived Joash only fifteen years, (17) either the sixteen years of Joash's reign must be reckoned from his father's death (Note, 13:10.) or, as some think, Amaziah's reign is computed from the time that his father Joash became incapable of managing public affairs (2 Chr. 24:23—27.)

V. 3, 4. Amaziah, like his father Joash, began apparently well, and ended very ill. He supported and regularly attended the worship of JEHOVAH yet not with the fervent piety of David: neither did he destroy the high places; where, probably

5 And it came to pass, as soon as the kingdom was confirmed in his hand, [f] that he slew [g] his servants which had slain the king his father.

6 But the children of the murderers he slew not: according unto that which is written in the book of the law of Moses, wherein the LORD commanded, saying, [h] The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, nor the children be put to death for the fathers; but every man shall be put to death for his own sin.

V. 5, 6. Amaziah did not at first venture to unish the conspirators, who had slain his father: nd it seems they continued at court as if they had one no wrong, and feared no danger; having only venged the death of Jehoiada's son on Jehoash, ithout attempting to injure Amaziah, or deprive im of the kingdom. (Note, 12:20,21.) But when e found himself sufficiently established in authory, he very properly punished them: but in doing is he strictly adhered to the command of God, not punishing their children with them. (Note, eut. 24:16.)—These references to the very words the law, as they now stand in the books of loses, should not be unnoticed. Undoubtedly ese books were extant, and well known, when is history was written.

V. 7. The name which Amaziah gave to Selah, gnifies Obedience to God; in which it is probable, e referred to his obedience to the word of God by e prophet in dismissing the auxiliaries of Israel, nd considered his victory as the reward of it: but s behavior, in the whole transaction, and afterards, very little agreed with this name. (Notes, Chr. 25:5—16.) Valley of salt.] Marg. Ref. i.

V. 8. The peace between Judah and Israel ad continued from the time of Asa, during above hundred years: and, though the affinity formed y Jehoshaphat with the house of Ahab had been fatal consequence to the royal family of Judah; et, on the whole, peace had been far more conucive to the welfare of both nations, than the inous wars which preceded and ensued. Perps Amaziah bore resentment against the family Jehu, for the slaughter of his relations: he had so received injurious treatment from the Israeles, whom he had engaged in his service, and nt back, having been forbidden to employ them. (Notes, 2 Chr. 25:6—10,13.) Perhaps he hoped to reduce Israel again under the dominion of the family of David. But, if he had not been actuated by a vain ambition, he would have made his complaints, and demanded satisfaction, and not have sent this foolish challenge. In effect, he informed Joash, that he scorned to attack him at a disadvantage: but wished him to bring forth all his forces, and make a fair trial of their military skill and valor in a pitched battle. (Notes, 2 Sam. 2:14—16. 2 Chr. 25:17—24. Prov. 13:10. 17:14. 20:18. 25:8—10.)

V. 9, 10. Joash rebuked Amaziah's pride, with an arrogance equally unreasonable. The thistle, a useless weed, which may by chance wound the foot of the incautious passenger, was made the emblem of the kingdom of Judah, and of the ancient and honorable house of David; while the house of Jehu was represented as a stately cedar! The thistle 'having drawn blood on some poor 'traveller, and sorely afflicted him (as Amaziah 'had done the Edomites) grew very proud, and 'would be no longer one of the shrubs, but equal 'to the most goodly trees.' Bp. Patrick. Joash intimated, that if Amaziah, upon his casual success against the Edomites, had presumed to solicit an alliance with him, he would have considered his proposals in the same light, as if the thistle should aspire to unite families with the cedar; and the meanest of his soldiers should have chastised his insolence, and crushed him, as easily as a wild beast of the forest could trample down the thistle how much more then, when Amaziah dared to challenge him to battle, would he bring destruction upon himself!—There was, however, much good sense in Joash's counsel. Let Amaziah rest satisfied with the reputation which he had acquired, and not meddle or rashly involve himself in a contest which his neighbor, who was disposed to peace, which would terminate in the disgrace and ruin of himself and his kingdom. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11—14. As Amaziah prepared for war, it became necessary for Joash to oppose him: in consequence Amaziah's army was completely routed, many lives were thrown away, Amaziah was made prisoner, Jerusalem was taken, and its fortifications to a large extent demolished, and the very temple plundered of its treasures and sacred vessels, by the rapacious and profane conqueror.

Came to Jerusalem. (13) 'Bringing Amaziah 'with him; and letting the inhabitants know, (as 'Josephus saith,) that he would slay him before 'their eyes, if they did not immediately open their 'gates unto him; which was accordingly done.' Bp. Patrick.

Hostages. (14) 'The sons, I suppose of the 'principal persons of the city, for a security that 'they would ... give him no disturbance.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 17—20. Joash, it seems, set Amaziah at liberty; and he survived Joash fifteen years. But the ill success of his rash expedition rendered his people disaffected to him, which at length produced a conspiracy, or open revolt, which drove him from Jerusalem to Lachish; whither the insurgents pursued him: and when they had slain him, either they brought him themselves, or suffered him to be brought, to Jerusalem to be buried. (Marg. Ref. h—k.—Note, 2 Chr. 25:25—27.)

V. 21. Azariah, or Uzziah, (words of similar meaning, the one signifying, The help of the Lord, and the other, the strength of the Lord,) is thought by some to have been very young, not more than four years of age, when his father was slain; and they suppose that he was not made king till about twelve years afterwards. Thus he began to reign in the twenty-seventh year of Jeroboam; though his father was slain in the fifteenth year of Jeroboam. (23. 15:1.) But the years of Azariah's reign are reckoned from his father's death: and therefore others suppose, that Jeroboam reigned along with his father Joash eleven or twelve years; so that reckoning his reign from this time, Azariah began to reign in his twenty-seventh year, though only fifteen or sixteen years after he began to reign alone. (23. 15:1. margins.)

V. 22. Elath.] This was a town upon the Red Sea, convenient for commerce, which the Edomites or Syrians had taken away from the kings of Judah. (Marg. Ref.) It is supposed that Amaziah had taken it, when he conquered the Edomites; but had not been able to derive much advantage from it, because of subsequent troubles; and that Azariah, after Amaziah's death, rebuilt and fortified it.

V. 23, 24. Jeroboam the second reigned much longer, than any other of the kings of Israel.—'As he had the name, so he trod in the steps of 'him, who first corrupted Israel with idolatry.' Bp. Patrick.—Joash, in giving this name to his son, seems almost to have pointed out to him the conduct, which he would have him adopt.

V. 25. The various enemies of Israel had encroached on their borders, from the northern to the southern extremity of the country belong-Azariah's good reign, 1—4. He is smitten with leprosy, and Jotham his son governs for him, and succeeds him, 5—7 Zachariah reigns ill, and is slain by Shallum; and the fulfilment of the word of God to Jehu is noticed, 8—12. After one month, Shallum is slain, and succeeded by Menahem; who treats his opposers with savage cruelty; reigns wickedly; becomes tributary to Pul, king of Assyria; dies, and is succeeded by his son Pekahiah, 13—22. Pekahiah reigns ill, and is slain and succeeded by Pekah, 23—26. Pekah imitates the sins of his predecessor; Tiglath-pileser of Assyria, carries captive part of Israel; and Hoshea kills and succeeds Pekah, 27—31. Jotham reigns well in Judah, 32—35. He dies, and is succeeded by his son Ahaz, 36—38.

ing to the ten tribes; from Lebanon to the dead or salt sea, which had been the plain of Sodom: but, Jeroboam, encouraged by the predictions of Jonah, drove back these enemies, and recovered the country. (Preface to Jonah.)

V. 26, 27. Joash had been successful, both against the Syrians and Judah. But probably the Syrians, not being totally subdued, still carried on destructive hostilities against Israel: and the neighboring nations, as the Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, made continual incursions, and plundered whatever they could seize upon; so that the most valuable treasures of the Israelites were pillaged, those who seemed to have taken refuge in the safest places were destroyed, and there were none to help them. But as the time for their final dispersion was not yet come, the Lord saved them by the hand of Jeroboam, notwithstanding his idolatries.—Blot out. (27) Notes, Ex. 32:30—33. Deut. 29:19,20.)

V. 28. Damascus and Hamath belonged to Judah, in the reigns of David and Solomon: Notes, 2 Sam. 8:3—11. 1 Kings 4:21.) and Jeroboam so effectually subdued the Syrians, that he obtained possession of them for Israel; which is called recovering them, because, though divided in government, Judah and Israel were still to be considered as one people.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

Many appear righteous unto men, whose inward parts are very wickedness, and whose base conduct at length betrays their hypocrisy. Yet the Lord gives due commendation to the actions which accord to his law, because thus far they honor him.—Where his judgments are most evidently righteous, the wickedness of the instruments may deserve punishment by the sword of the magistrate: and "the Judge of all the earth" may do many things consistently with his justice, and in his omniscience, unerring wisdom, and all-sufficiency, which would not be right for short-sighted, feeble mortals to imitate. It will appear, however, in the day of final retributions, that no one has suffered who did not deserve it, and that none perish but for their own sins.—Unsanctified success increases pride; pride excites contentions; and these are the sources of trouble and iniquity in private life: but when they arise between princes, they become the misery of whole kingdoms; and the blood of thousands is lightly esteemed by vainglorious mortals, who seek to be admired and extolled by men as foolish and worthless as themselves.—The effects of pride in others are often insufferable, even to those who are equally proud themselves; and all naturally delight in expressing contempt for such, as avowedly aim to outshine their neighbors.—We might smile at the ridiculous methods, which arrogant worms take to vaunt themselves, and to express their contempt of their rivals for fame; did not the fatal effects of such competitions call for our lamentations: and the vain boastings of those who follow peace are most tolerable, because most harmless. But did men consider from whom, and for what, their talents and successes were given, and how prone they are to abuse them; and did they understand how mean, guilty, and polluted man is, at his best estate, their boastings must needs be excluded. In reality, all the distinctions between one sinful man and another would not be worth noting, except for the sake of relative obligations, and the peace of society: but what images can shadow forth the absurdity and madness of those, who by their daring crimes seem to challenge the Almighty to the conflict, and to rush upon the thick bosses of his buckler? Or, who could have conceived such an amity and union, as the Lord invites us wretched sinners to enter into with himself, through the mysterious union of the divine and human nature in our Emmanuel?—In all our undertakings, we should previously consider our ability to accomplish them: and rather rest satisfied with moderate advantages, or inferior reputation, than risk the consequences of beginning what we are not able to finish, which is indeed to "meddle to our hurt." (Notes, Prov. 17:14. Luke 14:28—33.) But caution is especially needful, when if we fail of success, we cannot suffer alone, but must involve many in our calamities: and those who will not take fair warning and good advice, even from an insulting enemy, may too late wish they had.

V. 15—29.

Wicked princes and nations are frequently successful, because opposed by others more guilty than themselves.—The proud are often visited with most humiliating providences; and if not humbled by them, their destruction is inevitable. Yet even in those places, where ungodliness is generally prevalent, the Lord takes notice of the extreme bitterness under which men groan, and spares them from time to time, that his goodness may lead them to repentance. Especially, is he thus long-suffering to those nations, where he has a remnant of true believers.—But the lives and successes of wicked men are contracted within narrow limits, and they are soon "driven away in their wickedness," one after another. And though the Lord will never blot out the name of his true Israel from under heaven, but will always raise them up helpers, that the enemy may never prevail against his cause on earth: yet there is an appointed period to his patience and long suffering; beyond which

CHAP. XV. V. 1. Marg.—Notes, 14:21.

V. 2—7. (Notes, 2 Chr. 26:)—Two and fifty years. (2) The long reign of Azariah must be considered as very advantageous to Judah, when contrasted with the state of Israel during the same period.

A several house. (5) Retired, but spacious, where he had liberty to recreate himself, though excluded from public business.

V. 8. Amaziah reigned fifteen years after Jeroboam came to the crown of Israel; (14:17.) so that the death of Jeroboam, who reigned forty-one years, coincided with the twenty-sixth or twenty-seventh year of Azariah. An interregnum of about eleven years must therefore be allowed for, in the kingdom of Israel, between the death of Jeroboam, and the succession of his son: either because of his youth, or through the factious temper of the people. (Marg.)

V. 12. Notwithstanding the wickedness of Israel, and the persevering idolatry of Jehu and his descendants, the Lord would not proceed to execute vengeance upon them, till the predicted period. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 10:29—31.) And bad as Jehu's family was; the times, during which they reigned, were by far the best that Israel experienced, from their separation from the family of David to their final dispersion.

V. 13—16. Marg. Ref.—Tiphsah. (16) A city called Tiphsah, near the Euphrates, was one boundary of Solomon's dominions. (Note, 1 Kings 4:24.) But that was so far distant from Tirzah, that some other city of the same name, situated in Canaan, is supposed to be here meant. If, however, Menahem attempted to recover all that had been lost to Israel, after the death of Solomon, he might march to Tiphsah, on the Euphrates; and this might give occasion to the king of Assyria to invade his dominions.—All the women, &c.] This savage barbarity was exercised by Menahem against the inhabitants of those cities, which did not immediately submit to his usurped authority.—Things were now hastening to a fatal crisis in the kingdom of the ten tribes. After the death of Elisha, true religion evidently began to decline; and neither the labors, nor the writings, of the succeeding prophets could stop the rapid increase of immorality, idolatry, or profaneness, which inundated that people. This chapter gives such an account of their public affairs, as will af-

17 ¶ In [d] the nine and thirtieth year of Azariah king of Judah, began Menahem the son of Gadi to reign over Israel, and reigned ten years in Samaria.

18 And he did that which was [e] evil in the sight of the LORD: he departed not all his days from the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin.

19 And [f] Pul the king of Assyria came against the land; and [g] Menahem gave Pul a thousand talents of silver, that his hand might be with him, [h] to confirm the kingdom in his hand.

20 And [i] Menahem *exacted the money of Israel, even of all [k] the mighty men of wealth, of each man fifty shekels of silver, to give to the king of Assyria: so the king of Assyria turned back, and [l] stayed not there in the land.

21 And [m] the rest of the acts of Menahem, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the chronicles of the kings of Israel?

22 And Menahem slept with his fathers; and Pekahiah his son reigned in his stead.

23 ¶ In the fiftieth year of Azariah king of Judah, Pekahiah the son of Menahem began to reign over Israel in Samaria, [n] and reigned two years.

24 And he did that which was [o] evil in the sight of the LORD; he departed not from the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin.

25 But [p] Pekah the son of Remaliah, [q] a captain of his, [r] conspired against him, and smote him in Samaria, in the palace of the king's house, with Argob and Arieh, and with him fifty men of the Gileadites: and he killed him, and reigned in his room. [B. C. 759.]

26 And [s] the rest of the acts of Pekahiah, and all that he did, behold, they are written in the book of the chronicles of the kings of Israel.

27 ¶ In [t] the two and fiftieth year of Azariah king of Judah, [u] Pekah the son of Remaliah began to reign over Israel in Samaria, and reigned twenty years.

28 And he did that which was [v] evil in the sight of the LORD; he departed not from the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin. [B. C. 740.]

29 In the days of Pekah king of Israel, came [x] Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria, and took [y] Ijon, and [z] Abel-beth-maachah, and [a] Janoah, and [b] Kedesh, and [c] Hazor, and [d] Gilead, and [e] Galilee, all the land of Naphtali, and [f] carried them captive to Assyria.

ford the attentive reader great assistance in understanding the writings of those prophets, who lived during that period, viz. Isaiah, Hoshea, Micah, and Amos.

V. 19, 20. The king of Assyria, coming to invade Israel, seems to have found the people much disaffected to Menahem, who must have been odious for his cruelties; but he, having made submission to Pul, and engaged for the payment of one thousand talents of silver, (nearly four hundred thousand pounds,) obtained his assistance in subjugating the Israelites, and was thus confirmed in the kingdom; and then by force he extorted the money from his richer subjects. Thus the kingdom was impoverished, and the people exasperated; and that powerful prince having been so well paid for invading the land, left an example to his successors, which they followed till they had totally desolated the country.—The kingdom of Assyria is here mentioned, for the first time, after the building of Nineveh by Nimrod. (Note, Gen. 10:8--12.) And this shews, that the history, given by many writers, of a very prosperous nd large monarchy, lasting for much above a housand years previous to this time, is in great measure a romance. David and Solomon met with no opposition from the kings of Assyria, in establishing their kingdom, even to the Euphrates. Nor is Assyria once mentioned in their history. Assur indeed helped the Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, on some occasions: but yet the very connexion implies, that it was of itself not very considerable. (Note, Ps. 83:6—8.) But it seems that Nineveh had by this time become a very great city, and no doubt the king of Nineveh had acquired a considerable territory. (Jon. 1:2. 3:3,4. 4:11.) And some think that Pul was the king, when Jonah prophesied against Nineveh. It is not, however, agreed, whether he was one of the ancient line of the Assyrian kings; or whether he was one of those who effected that revolution, which, all allow, took place about this time; and so was the father of Tiglath-pileser. The latter indeed seems most probable: but such darkness and uncertainty rest on this part of ancient history, that the most learned men differ exceedingly in their opinions on the subject. (Notes, 1 Chr. 5:25,26. 2 Chr. 28:16—18.)

Of each man fifty shekels. (20) 'He gave to the 'king of Assyria so many shekels for every man .. 'in his army. So they' (the Hebrew words) 'run 'exactly, "to give to the king of Assyria fifty 'shekels of silver for each man." ' Bp. Patrick It may be supposed, that Menahem compelled "the mighty men of wealth" to give much more apiece than this sum, and each of them in some proportion to his affluence.

V. 25. It does not clearly appear, whether Argob, Arieh, and the fifty Gileadites, were slain with the king; or whether they were conspirators with Pekah.

V. 29. Pul seems to have carried captive many out of those tribes which dwelt to the east of Jordan: (Note, 1 Chr. 5:25,26.) and Tiglath-pileser, 30 And Hoshea the son of Elah, [g] made [a] conspiracy against Pekah the son of Remaliah, [h] and smote him, and slew him, B. C. 739. and *reigned in his stead, [i] in † the twentieth year of Jotham the son of Uzziah.

31 And the rest of the acts of Pekah, and all that he did, behold, they are written in the book of the chronicles of the kings of Israel.

32 In the second year of Pekah the son of Remaliah king of Israel, began [k] Jotham the son of [l] Uzziah king of Judah to reign.

33 Five and twenty years old was he when he began to reign, and he reigned B. C. 758. sixteen years in Jerusalem. And his mother's name was [m] Jerusha the daughter of Zadok.

34 And he did that which was right in the sight of the LORD: he did [n] according to all that his father Uzziah had done.

35 Howbeit [o] the high places were not removed: the people sacrificed and burnt incense still in the high places. He built [p] the higher gate of the house of the LORD.

36 Now [q] the rest of the acts of Jotham, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah?

37 In those days the LORD [r] began [s] to send against Judah [t] Rezin, the king of Syria, and [u] Pekah the son of Remaliah.

38 And [x] Jotham slept with his fathers, and was buried with his fathers in the city of David his father: and [y] Ahaz his son reigned in his stead.

who is, with great probability, thought to have been his son and successor, carried captive a considerable number of the inhabitants of the northern parts of the land, as well as the inhabitants of the districts to the east of Jordan. V. 30. In the twentieth, &c.] That is, the twentieth year from Jotham's accession; for he reigned only sixteen years; (33) and Hoshea succeeded Pekah in the fourth year of Ahaz, though he was not established in the kingdom till the twelfth year of that king. It is also evident from the whole narrative, that Ahaz reigned over Judah some time before the death of Pekah. (Note, 17:1.) Perhaps the conspiracy was entered into before the death of Jotham; but was not successful till four years after. In respect of many of these difficulties in settling the chronology, (which infidels vainly magnify into objections against the sacred history,) it may be proper to observe, that no writer wilfully contradicts himself within a few lines: and therefore some solution of the difficulty should be sought, and must exist, whether our information enable us to solve it or not.

V. 32—36. Marg. Ref.—Notes, 2 Chr. 27:—In the second year. (32) Pekah reigned twenty years. (27) Jotham therefore began his reign seventeen or eighteen years before the death of Pekah: consequently Pekah survived Jotham a considerable time; as indeed the scriptures referred to (Note, 31.) fully prove. (Note, 30.)

V. 37. In the days of Jotham, those designs of Rezin and Pekah were formed, and in some degree carried into effect, which became far more formidable during the reign of Ahaz. (Notes, 30. 2 Chr. 28:1—15. Is. 7:1—9.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

The study of history has a tendency to render the reflecting person thankful even for a mediocrity of character, in those placed in authority; and to dispose him to bear patiently many evident faults in the administration of public affairs. For as every thing may be estimated by comparison; and as the history of the world exhibits by far the greater part of princes desperately wicked, and the people exposed to every kind of misery, in consequence of their ambition, cruelty, and tyranny, or the contests between rivals for power: so, we may repress our murmurs under slighter grievances, by reflecting with grateful satisfaction on our exemption from flagrant oppressions. In this view, we seem to congratulate Judah, under the peaceful reigns of Azariah and Jotham; as that kingdom was very highly favored, compared with the distracted state of Israel, under a succession of bloody murderers, usurpers, and tyrants. And if the inhabitants of our land of liberty and peace can read this narration, without forgetting their imaginary or trivial causes for complaint, or without blessing God for their mercies, and praying for their rulers, and the continuance of our distinguishing privileges, they cannot be acquitted from the charge of base ingratitude.—But with regret we must observe, that such is the depraved tendency of human nature to evil, that revivals in religion are commonly transient: whereas corruptions endure from age to age, and few good men have at once power and courage effectually to remove them. For great defects are found even in godly persons: and, though they are graciously accepted, as to their eternal state, they are often in this world marked with the tokens of the divine displeasure for particular offences, by which they have dishonored him; nor can any situation prevent these effects of sin.—When persons in authority are incapacitated from the duties of their high station, it is peculiarly happy for them and for the public, when they have children, who, like Jotham, are disposed and qualified to fill up their places, and to enter into their views of serving God and doing good to the people; and who can give satisfaction both to them and to the community.—The imperfections of true believers are very different from the allowed, habitual, and pertinacious wickedness of ungodly

CHAP. XVI.

Ahaz reigns very wickedly, 1—4. Rezin and Pekah war against him; and Rezin takes Elath, 5, 6. Ahaz hires Tiglath-pileser against them, who takes Damascus and slays Rezin, 7—9. Ahaz sends a pattern of an altar from Damascus; and Urijah, the high priest, makes one like it for burnt-offerings; reserving the brazen altar for Ahaz to inquire by, 10—16. Ahaz robs and defaces the temple for the king of Assyria, 17, 18. He dies, and is succeeded by his son Hezekiah, 19, 20.

IN the [a] seventeenth year of Pekah the son of Remaliah, [b] Ahaz the son of Jotham king of Judah began to reign.

2 Twenty years old was Ahaz when he began to reign, and reigned sixteen years in Jerusalem, and [c] did not that which was right in the sight of the LORD his God, like David his father.

nen. In the former, the remains indeed of de-ravity are visible, and occasionally break forth nto evident evil: but in the latter case, when estraints of conscience, regard to reputation, ear of human laws, and want of power, are sur-nounted; the desperate wickedness of the heart, ke an impetuous torrent which has burst its anks, bears down all opposition, and spreads evastation all around.

V. 13—38.

The words concerning Jeroboam, so often re-eated, for ages after his death, that "he made srael to sin," should impress our minds with read and horror, at the thought of tempting thers to wickedness; as it can never be known ow extensively or durably the mischief may pread. For, however ungodly men may disa-ree in all other things, they perfectly accord, n either utterly neglecting religion, or in mak-ng it a state-engine, or in some way subservient o their selfish projects: and the most notorious nd detestable idolatries and superstitions have, n many kingdoms, been supported by authority rom generation to generation, through success-ve revolutions in the government, by those who n their hearts despised the whole system which ney patronised!—When the gratification of am-ition, avarice, revenge, or lust, requires it, there no conceivable kind or degree of treachery nd barbarity, which men may not be tempted o commit: yet the madness of those who thus ct, equals their wickedness; for repeated exam-es of the fatal end of those, who through blood ave waded to a throne, will not deter them from ressing forward in the same way, and mounting ne slippery pre-eminence, to be thence hurried y a violent death to a premature grave! We ould then be thankful for external restraints, nd for being kept out of temptation; and beg of od incessantly to "create in us a clean heart, nd renew a right spirit within us:" and may he elp us to seek that honor which comes from m, to those who do good in their generation; nd to dread that greatness, which is obtained nd secured by doing mischief and diffusing mis-ry. Yet in these horrid scenes, the truth and stice of God are manifest: they perfectly ac-ord to the character of human nature given in ne Scriptures, and form a confirmation of their vine original.—"For the wickedness of the land any are the princes thereof;" whose crimes nd sufferings are the punishment of the sins oth of the governors and governed. (Note, Prov. 28:2.) "A man that doeth violence to the lood of any person, shall flee to the pit; let no an stay him." (Note, Prov. 28:17.) For a time, wicked men may prosper, to execute the vengeance of God on other sinners, and then others will be raised up to execute vengeance on them; as criminals, or the refuse of society, are commonly employed for public executioners.—The most innocent sufferers from man's wickedness must plead guilty before God, and may often read his just displeasure in the injustice and cruelty of their oppressors.—Proud men cannot endure contradiction, and the ambitious are exasperated by opposition: yet often, in aiming at independence and supreme authority, they crouch with the basest submissions, and bring themselves into the most abject dependence on strangers and enemies, who from mercenary motives, at first assist, and then enslave them.—Death in various forms hurries men to God's judgment seat: the righteous are then taken from the evil to come, and enter into rest; and it is a mercy to be spared the anguish of witnessing the miseries that are coming on corrupted churches and nations. But the wicked are stopped in their career, that they may do no more mischief, and "their lamp is put out in utter darkness." May we live the life of faith and holiness, and die the death of the righteous, that "an entrance may be ministered to us abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ!"

NOTES.

CHAP. XVI. V. 2. "He did not that which was right in the sight of the LORD his God, like David his father;" 'as might have been expected 'from the good education, which no doubt, so 'pious a man as Jotham his father gave him; who 'left him an excellent example.' Bp. Patrick. Ahaz was an entire contrast to his ancestor David, and a disgrace to his family.

V. 3, 4. Ahaz imitated the kings of Israel, in worshipping idols. and rebelling against the Lord. It is said in Chronicles that he "burnt his children in the fire," and here that he "made his son to pass through the fire," to consecrate him to the demon which he worshipped. (2 Chr. 28:1—4. Notes, Lev. 18:21. 20:2—5.) In short he copied the crimes of the Canaanites, whom God had destroyed by Israel; (Note, Lev. 18:24—30.) and not only allowed, but set the people an example of, a variety of idolatrous practices. Hezekiah was born some years before the death of Jotham; if he was the son here intended, he was past his infancy at the time. (Note, 18:2.) He, however, proved an eminently pious prince, and an entire contrast to his most wicked father. (Notes, 18:—20:)

ed Ahaz, [i] but could not overcome him.

6 At that time Rezin king of Syria [k] recovered Elath to Syria, and drave the Jews from * Elath: and the Syrians came to Elath, and dwelt there unto this day.

7 So Ahaz sent messengers [l] to † Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria, saying, [m] I am thy servant, and thy son: come up [n] and save me out of the hand of the king of Syria, and out of the hand of the king of Israel, which rise up against me.

8 And Ahaz took [o] the silver and gold that was found in the house of the LORD, and in the treasures of the king's house, and sent it for a present [p] to the king of Assyria.

9 And the king of Assyria hearkened unto him; for the king of Assyria [q] went up against ‡ Damascus, and took it, and carried the people of it captive to [r] Kir, [s] and slew Rezin.

10 ¶ And king Ahaz went to Damascus to meet Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria, [t] and saw an altar that was at Damascus: and king Ahaz sent to Urijah the priest the fashion of the altar, and [u] the pattern of it, according to all the workmanship thereof.

14 And he brought also [c] the brazen altar which was before the LORD, from the forefront of the house, from between the altar and the house of the LORD, and put it on the north side of [d] the altar.

V. 5. The Lord brought these enemies against Ahaz for his crimes: their successes, and the miseries of Judah were very great, immense numbers being slain and taken prisoners; and Ahaz was extremely terrified. But they could not take Jerusalem, dethrone Ahaz, and destroy the family of David, as they had intended: for this was contrary to the purpose, the promises, and the prophecies of God. (Notes, 2 Chr. 28:5—19. Ps. 76:10. Is. 7:1—9.)

V. 6. (Note, 14:22.)—The word "Jews" is here first used. It is literally the Judeans; that is, the men of Judah; as all those, who adhered to the family of David, were called, to distinguish them from the subjects of the kings who reigned over the ten tribes, called Israel.—The general custom among even learned writers, of calling the nation of Israel Jews, from the days of Moses, and even before, is inaccurate and unscriptural.

V. 7—9. (Notes, 15:19,20,29.) As the king of Assyria brought Ahaz into abject dependence on him, and both weakened him and drained his treasury, it is said that "he distressed him, but strengthened him not," (2 Chr. 28:20,21.) though he averted the present storm.—From this time Syria ceased to be a kingdom: and the region formed successively a part of the kingdom of Assyria, of Chaldea, or of Persia; till it was subjugated by Alexander the Great; after whose death, a new kingdom of Syria was formed, which, with all his other dominions, at length became a part of the Roman empire. (Note, Dan. 7:6.) Ahaz feared danger to his kingdom from Syria, and sought help from Assyria; whence indeed the greatest danger was to be apprehended. (Note, Is. 7:17—25.)

V. 10—16. (Notes, 2 Chr. 25:14—16. 28:22, 23.) Ahaz sacrificed to the gods of the vanquished Syrians, perhaps when he went to Damascus to congratulate Tiglath-pileser on his success. There he saw an altar, in the temple of some of their idols, which appeared to him more magnificent or convenient, than that which Solomon had made according to the will of God. At the command of Ahaz, with which he sent a model of the altar from Damascus, probably adorned by many figures of idols, the wretched high priest, Urijah, without scruple or hesitation, prepared one like it, with which he profaned the court of the temple; and when Ahaz returned the altar of God was removed to make way for it. It is uncertain whether sacrifices were offered to the gods of Damascus on this altar, or whether the oblations were presented to JEHOVAH alone.—It seems that Ahaz professed a purpose of converting the former altar into an ora

ers of the bases, and removed the laver
om off them; and took down [1] the sea

Some however think, that Ahaz ily meant, that he would take advice what to with the altar: and tradition reports that he molished it, and made a sun-dial, (called the n-dial of Ahaz,) of the brass. (20:11.) But is is uncertain, and not probable: for we do not ad, that Hezekiah made any altar, as in that se he must have done. In the whole transac- on, the high priest was willing to oblige the ng by servile compliances; and did not, as far it appears, need either menaces, or promises, even bribes, to procure his concurrence! (Note, 2 Chr. 5:16—23.)

V. 17, 18. Ahaz pillaged and defaced the tem- e, and its courts, and sacred utensils, in various ays, either to supply his necessities with the under, or to express his enmity against the orship of the Lord. (2 Chr. 28:24,25.) The cov- t of the sabbath, and the entry, seem to have en accommodations for the king and his at- ndants to repair to the temple-service. To ease the king of Assyria, who it is probable id him a visit, he turned these another way, or other uses. (Notes, 1 Kings 10:5. Ez. 46:1 3.)

V. 20. Ahaz died young: and it has been ob- rved that no king of Judah reached David's e of seventy years, though some of them reign- l longer than he had done: but the age of Asa not recorded.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The word of God affords abundant encourage- ent to pious parents to give their children good structions, enforced by good examples, and pray for them: and these means are so gener- ly made effectual, as sufficiently to verify the overb, "Train up a child in the way he should ; and when he is old, he will not depart from it." Vote, Prov. 22:6.) Yet there are exceptions re- orded in the Scriptures, to remind us, that every an is born in sin, and that the grace of God one can change the heart; in order that we ay expect the blessing from him only. On the her hand, some who have been, as it were, early edicated to Satan, and initiated into his service, ave, by the victorious grace of God, been made minent examples of faith and piety: and every curate observer of mankind, in places favored ith the light of the gospel, has remarked in- ances of both.—The infatuated slaves of sin edlessly proceed in those paths, whence others ave been hurried into destruction. But we ed not wonder that men violate the law of God, the indulgence of their natural passions, when they cannot be restrained from disobeying him, in the most unnatural cruelty to themselves and their own children: nor should the insolence and obstinacy of prosperous sinners excite astonish- ment; seeing so many sin more and more, while severely suffering under the effects of former crimes!--Such is man's carnal enmity against God, that he will have recourse to any expedi- ent, or make the most abject submission to his fellow-creatures, rather than humble himself be- fore God, and seek help from him! But the be- lief thus obtained, tends to enfeeble and enslave men the more; and it often accelerates, as well as increases, that ruin which it seemed to retard. —Our natural propensity to some sort of religion is not easily extinguished: but, except it be reg- ulated according to the word and by the Spirit of God, it produces the most absurd superstitions, or the most detestable idolatries; or at best it quiets the sinner's conscience, and amuses his mind, with a round of unmeaning ceremonies, fre- quently connected with the most immoral prac- tices. Even infidels have been remarkable for credulity; and the capacity of believing, when not exercised on the truth, frequently embraces the most ridiculous falsehoods. But whether kings are impious, or superstitious, or infidel, or sacrilegious, they generally meet with priests of their own stamp, who court their favor by assist- ing their iniquities or idolatries! Yet such mer- cenary time-servers and men-pleasers, who bear the name and wear the garb of ministers, are guilty of a greater breach of trust, and the pros- titution of a more sacred character, than even the wicked princes whom they flatter and em- bolden in their sins: as their conduct is, in the highest degree, dishonorable to God and ruinous to man, they merit the deepest contempt and de- testation; and assuredly they will "receive the greater damnation," except by a miracle of grace they are brought to repentance.—The arrogant self-wisdom, which induces men to new model divine ordinances after their own vain imagina- tions, is insufferably provoking to that "God, who resisteth the proud:" and that external mag- nificence, which carnal minds affect in his wor- ship, obscures the real glory of heavenly things, excites false ideas of the divine character, and turns men aside from that spiritual service, which alone the Lord accepts and delights in. (Notes, John 4:21—24.) Thus, new ways of worshipping God very speciously introduce gross idolatries; as the church of Israel, and that of Rome, among other examples, have abundantly evinced. But when men forsake God, they forsake their own mercies: and if those who have been trained up in the ways of God, forsake his house and ordi- nances; and, affecting to be wiser than their pious parents, turn things into another channel, asso- ciate with more fashionable companions, and seek to acquire the favor, assistance, or commendation of ungodly men; there is reason to fear that sud- den destruction is coming upon them, from which they shall by no means escape. (Notes, 21:1—3. 1 Kings 12:6—15. Ec. 2:18—23.)

Hoshea becomes tributary to Shalmaneser, conspires with the king of Egypt against him, and is shut up in prison by the king of Assyria, 1—4. NOTES.

CHAP. XVII. V. 1. (Note, 15:30.) During more than eight years after the slaughter of Pekah, Hoshea was kept out of possession of the kingdom, or was unsettled in it: and the years of his reign are reckoned from his establishment on the throne, and not from the death of his predecessor.

V. 2. We are told by the Jewish writers, that the golden calf had before this been carried away from Dan; (Notes, Hos. 10:5—8.) that Hoshea did not enforce that idolatry as his predecessors had done; and that he allowed the Israelites, who were so disposed, to go up to Jerusalem to worship. (Note, 2 Chr. 30:6—9.) He, however, did "evil in the sight of the LORD;" though he was not in all respects so wicked as his predecessors. Whether an idolater, or not, he was ungodly; and his murder of Pekah, and usurpation of the kingdom, merited the punishment which he endured: whilst the people were fully ripe for destruction; and the guilt, which had been accumulating for ages, was punished in that generation. (Note, Zech. 5:5—11. P. O.)—In finally destroying the kingdom of Israel, during the time of that king, who was less wicked than the rest; the Lord shewed, that he punished the crimes of the people at large, and not those of their princes only, as many might be ready to imagine. (Note, 2 Sam. 24:1,2.)

V. 3. It is most probable that Shalmaneser was the son of Tiglath-pileser.—Menahem had given his predecessor Pul footing in the land, and encouragement to come again; by raising a large sum of money for him, and by rendering his kingdom dependent on him. Ahaz king of Judah likewise, by purchasing the help of Tiglath-pileser, had procured the destruction of the kingdom of Syria, which was of small extent and force, compared with that of Assyria: and thus every rampart was broken down, which could exclude the Assyrians from the land of Israel and Judah. (Notes, 15:19,20. 16:7—9.)

V. 4. So is supposed to be the same person, as is called Sabacus, or Sabacon, in pagan writers. He was king of Ethiopia; but he invaded Egypt, took possession of the kingdom, and reigned there for a long term of years.—About this time, or rather earlier, the rivalship began between the kings of Egypt, and the monarchs of different nations, who successively were powerful in Asia, to the north, or north-east of Canaan; which, lying between the contending powers, was for many ages brought into dependence on the one or the other of them. (Notes, 2 Chr. 35:20—24. Dan. 11:5. Zech. 9:8.) But the people, contrary to the commands of God, were more disposed to unite with the Egyptians, than with any of their opponents.—Had Hoshea endeavored to effect a thorough reformation in Israel; and then, in dependence on God, had he openly attempted to shake off every foreign yoke; he might possibly have succeeded. But the manner, in which he attempted to change one yoke for another, without returning to the Lord, or seeking his assistance, formed a mixture of perfidy, impolicy, and ungodliness; and proved the immediate occasion of his ruin and that of his people. It seems probable, that Shalmaneser by some means took Hoshea prisoner, before he laid siege to Samaria: and that Hoshea ended his days in a prison. His name is the same as that, by which Joshua was at first called: (Note, Num. 13:16.) so that the settlement of Israel in Canaan, and the expulsion of the ten tribes from it, occurred under the government of persons originally of the same name!

V. 5, 6. The inhabitants of Samaria doubtless endured great extremities, in the long siege and terrible destruction of the city: but the brevity of the sacred historian seems significantly to intimate, that the Lord did not now notice their affliction, as he had done before the measure of their iniquities was filled. (Notes, 14:26,27. 18:9—12. Hos. 8:7,8. 10:14,15. 13:15,16. Mic. 1:5—7.)—When Shalmaneser had taken Samaria, and become absolute master of the whole land, he formed the project of changing the inhabitants, and in part accomplished it; but it was more fully completed by Esar-haddon, his grandson, several years afterwards. (Ezra 4:2.) It is, however, here spoken of by anticipation. Yet it seems, that some of the poorer Israelites were at last left in the land, many of whom were incorporated with the new inhabitants. (2 Chr. 34:6,7.) But, as the northern part of the country, called Galilee, was, in the time of Christ, inhabited by persons acknowledged to be of the seed of Israel, who went up to Jerusalem to worship; whilst the middle of the country was occupied by the Samaritans, who were of another origin and religion; it is probable that the new inhabitants did not so fully occupy the northern, as the middle parts of the land.—Probably, the Israelites, who were carried captive to a great distance, in the dominions of the conqueror, were chiefly incorporated among the nations: yet some of them seemed to have retained the knowledge of their original, and of part of their religion; and either to have returned with their brethren after the Babylonish captivity, or to have united with those Jews, who were afterwards dispersed in many different countries of the world. (Note, Ezra 2:64. Luke 2:36—38.)—Some, however, think, that incorporated bodies of them are still existing.

V. 7—11. The iniquities of Israel were many and aggravated: but their apostacy from God to idolatry especially formed the violation of the national covenant. The Lord had, as it were, graciously espoused them to himself: but this spiritual adultery excited his jealousy; and, by persisting in it, they provoked him to give them a writing of divorcement, and to put them away. (Note, Jer. 3:6—11.) They had, as a nation, experienced his power and love in delivering them from Egypt, and giving them Canaan; and they had witnessed and executed his vengeance upon the idolatrous Canaanites: yet, in disobedience to express and repeated commandments, they had ungratefully and absurdly worshipped their idols. They had also willingly obeyed the orders of idolatrous kings to worship the golden calves and Baalim. (Note, Hos. 5:11,12.) They had likewise committed much secret idolatry, in addition to that which was established by law; and especially they had worshipped the sun, moon, and stars, which as the hosts or armies of God, stationed in the visible heavens, are employed to fulfil his will: (Note, Deut. 4:19.) and finally, they so multiplied their temples, or altars, that they were found in every village, and at every shepherd's lodge, where he watched his flocks and fruits, (Is. 1:8. Note, Hos. 12:10,11.) as well as in the fenced cities. Thus "they wrought wicked things," as if they had expressly intended "to provoke the LORD to anger;" so that at length the predicted and denounced judgments came upon them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12—14. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Neh. 9:26—30. Zech. 1:5,6.) The people rejected the testimonies of God which he testified against them; and they did not believe in him, or depend on him for protection, according to his promises. They hoped to sin with impunity, and concluded that the service of the Lord would be unprofitable. They not only violated the law, by presumptuously doing those things, concerning which "the LORD had said unto them, Ye shall not do this thing;" (Note, Num. 15:30,31.) but they persisted in their rebellion and idolatry, and hardened their hearts in impenitency. (Notes, Jer. 8:4—7. Ez. 18:30—32. Rom. 2:4—6.) "To harden the neck," is a metaphor taken from the stiffness of the neck of an ox, when with his full strength he resists the attempts of the husbandman, to put the yoke upon him, or to bring him to draw in it: and it aptly represents the self-will, earnestness, and stubbornness, with which the presumptuous sinner sets himself to rebel against God, in the midst of warnings, convictions, judgments, and mercies. (Note, 2 Chr. 30:6—9. Prov. 29:1. Is. 48:3—5.) 'This 'was the original of all the sins they committed; 'they did not believe God's prophets, but hearkened to deceivers.' Bp. Patrick.

charged them, that they should not do like them.

16 And they left all the commandments of the LORD their God, and made them [x] molten images, even two calves, and made [y] a grove, and [z] worshipped all the host of heaven, and served [a] Baal.

17 And [b] they caused their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire, and [c] used divination and enchantments, and [d] sold themselves to do evil [e] in the sight of the LORD, to provoke him to anger.

18 Therefore the LORD was very angry with Israel, and [f] removed them out of his sight: there was none left but [g] the tribe of Judah only.

19 Also [h] Judah kept not the commandments of the LORD their God, but [i] walked in the statutes of Israel which they made.

20 And the LORD [k] rejected [l] all the seed of Israel, and afflicted them, and [m] delivered them into the hand of spoilers, [n] until he had cast them out of his sight.

21 For [o] he rent Israel from the house of David: and [p] they made Jeroboam the son of Nebat king: and [q] Jeroboam drave Israel from following the LORD, and made them sin [r] a great sin.

22 For the children of Israel [s] walked in all the sins of Jeroboam which he did; they departed not from them:

23 Until [t] the LORD removed Israel out of his sight, [u] as he had said by all his servants the prophets. [x] So was Israel carried away out of their own land to Assyria, unto this day.

[Practical Observations.]

25 And so it was at the beginning of their dwelling there, that [d] they feared not the LORD; therefore [e] the LORD sent lions among them, which slew some of them.

26 Wherefore they spake to the king of Assyria, saying, The nations which thou hast removed, [f] and placed in the cities of Samaria, [g] know not the manner of the God of the land: therefore he hath sent lions among them, and, behold, they slay them, because they know not the manner of the God of the land.

V. 15. Became vain.] By making and worshipping lifeless images, the people became senseless, like unto them: and by worshipping imagined deities under these images, they learned to imitate all the vices ascribed to those demons. Thus among the Greeks and Romans, the worshippers of Bacchus revelled in intemperance, those of Venus rioted in licentiousness, and those of Mars delighted in shedding human blood. The case is the same with modern idolaters. By worshipping Satan under all these names, they were conformed to the very nature, and imbibed all the hateful qualities, of that arch-apostate and rebel. (Note, Rom. 1:24—32.)

V. 16. It is probable that the words (אֲשֵׁרָה and אֲשֵׁרִים) rendered a grove and groves, (10) mean some kind of images set up in the temples originally built in groves; and not the trees which formed the grove. (Notes, 21:7,8, v. 7. 1 Kings 14:22—24.)

V. 17. Marg. Ref.—Notes, 16:3,4. Ex. 22:18. Deut. 18:9—12.—To provoke, &c.] The people acted, as if their express intention had been to provoke the Lord to anger: they had sold themselves as slaves to Satan, to work evil in the sight of God, that they might in every thing displease him as much as possible. V. 24. (Note, 5, 6.) Shalmaneser seems to have carried away all the chief men, and the bulk of the nation; but to have left some poor remains of the Israelites, who dwelt in the land, during the remainder of his reign, and the busy reign of Sennacherib. But Esarhaddon more entirely removed the old inhabitants, and peopled the country from different parts of his dominions: and by that time Babylon, which had formed a distinct kingdom, was brought under the government of the king of Assyria, and some of these new inhabitants were removed from thence. (Notes, 2 Chr. 33:11. Ezra 4:10.)—The cities in the region of Samaria had not been destroyed, but reserved for the new inhabitants. (Marg. Ref.)

27 Then the king of Assyria commanded, saying, Carry thither [h] one of the priests whom ye brought from thence, and let them go and dwell there, and let him teach them the manner of the God of the land.

name; and he was pleased to shew them, that Israel had not been dispossessed, because he was not able to defend them, but because he had given them up to ruin for their sins. It was also proper they should be convinced, that they had no right to their new possessions, except by JEHOVAH's allowance; and that he expected that they should do him homage for their estates: and therefore a number of lions were let loose upon them, as soon as they entered the land. The desolations of war would naturally make way for the increase of wild beasts: but these lions assaulted the people in so remarkable a manner; that they reasonably and truly concluded, that they were sent by "the God of the land" to punish them for not serving him. (Notes, Judg. 16: 23,24. 1 Kings 20:23—25. Dan. 5:1—4.)

V. 27, 28. It is not at all probable, that this instructer was a priest of the family of Aaron, or that he taught the people from the book of the divine law; as some have thought. One of the priests "carried away from Samaria" is expressly mentioned. And the person selected, had, most likely, been one of the priests, either of the golden calf at Beth-el, or of some high place in that neighborhood: accordingly he resorted to Beth-el as his residence, when sent to teach the people to worship the God of the land, having doubtless assistants in the business.—It is, however, probable, that he did not teach them to worship JEHOVAH by images; though we can only know what he taught, by the result: but it is evident, they were led to consider JEHOVAH as the local tutelary god of the land, one among a group of other deities; instead of worshipping him as the one, true, eternal, almighty, and glorious Creator, Governor, and Judge of the world. (Note, Jer. 10:6—8,11. Zeph. 2:11. Zech. 14:6—9.) They probably learned to offer sacrifices, with some external regard to the ceremonies of the Mosaic law, but without understanding the meaning and use of the sacred ordinances: but it is not certain whether circumcision was introduced among the Samaritans at this time, or at a later period. (Notes, 41. Neh. 13:23—30.) Along with these and such like observances, they were allowed. or they assumed, the liberty of serving their own idols, according to the customs of their several tribes.

V. 29.—31. Learned men have framed many conjectures concerning the meaning of the several names here made use of, and the idols and idolatries signified by them. But such obsolete abominations, with which every thing brutal, cruel, and licentious was connected, are not worth understanding. (Notes, Ex. 23:13. Josh. 23:7. Jer. 10:11. Zech. 13:2,3.)

the chief nobles were ambitious of the honor, of being priests to their favorite idols!

V. 33—40. The new inhabitants of the land imitated the idolatrous Israelites, by associating their idols with JEHOVAH, as the objects of worship. The remainder, however, of the verses seems to relate to the Israelites after they were carried captive. They still persevered in idolatry and disobedience; and, not being purified, were left to be consumed, in the furnace.—It is said, that the Israelites "did not fear the LORD;" (34) yet the heathens, who followed their example, are said "to have feared the LORD." (32,40.) The Israelites did not so much as fear the wrath of the almighty God: but on the other hand the poor Pagans feared the power of his wrath, and to avert it paid him some ignorant worship, according to the wretched instructions given them. As this was an external acknowledgment of his power and Godhead, and a homage paid to him, he was pleased in consequence to withdraw his judgments from them.

V. 41. Some ascribe these words to Jeremiah, the supposed writer of this part of the history, others to Ezra after the captivity. However, these Cutheans, (as the Jews call them from Cuthah, 24.) maintained this mongrel religion till after that latter period, and so were proper successors of idolatrous Israel, the professed people of God. About four hundred years before Christ, a temple was built by them, in competition with the temple at Jerusalem: for, having been joined by a number of apostate Jews and a priest of the family of Aaron, they renounced gross idolatry, and became schismatical worshippers of JEHOVAH, receiving some parts, and rejecting others, of the Jewish scriptures. (Notes, 27,28. Neh. 13:23—30.) It is not requisite to decide, whether there were any true godliness among them: but, as a people, "they knew not what they worshipped, for salvation was of the Jews." (Notes, John 4:19—24.) Christ commanded his disciples, whom he sent forth in his life-time, not to enter into any city of the Samaritans: yet he himself spent two days at Sychar, one of their cities; (Note, John 4:39—42.) and the apostles after the day of Pentecost did not regard the Samaritans as Gentiles; for they preached in their cities before the conversion of Cornelius. (Notes, Acts 1:4—8. 8:5—8. 10:1,2.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

The long-suffering of God, instead of leading sinners to repentance, often renders them more secure: for, having long transgressed with impunity, they conclude that there is no danger; and thus they "treasure up wrath against the day of wrath." (Notes, Ec. 8:11—13. Rom. 2:4—6.)—Ungodly men are not all alike abandoned to flagrant enormities: but the least criminal deserve worse than the most severe temporal calamities; and consequently none have any right to complain, if God the righteous Sovereign shall see good, in their days, to execute upon a guilty people the accumulated vengeance of many generations. For when the appointed measure of iniquity is filled up, the Lord will forbear no longer. Then kings and people reciprocally suffer on account of each other's crimes; and their causes and interests are no more separable, in the great concerns of national judgments and mercies, than those of the head, or heart, and the several members of the human body. (P. O. 2 Sam. 24:1—9.)—When the service of God, which is perfect freedom, is renounced, men become slaves to the vilest and most tyrannical of masters: and sinners, left to themselves, never attempt any thing more than a change of one tyrant for another; not having the most remote idea or expectation of complete liberty in the service of God. The extravagant profligate sometimes, in advancing years, exchanges the bondage of his sensual lusts, for the yoke of avarice or ambition; and the immoral and profane may commence Pharisees, or hypocrites: but mere nature can advance little further than this. Yet the gospel calls us, not only to break our league with every lust, and to renounce every sinful connexion, however formed, confirmed, or palliated by specious pretences; but to refuse obedience to every superior who would require us to sin against God; which if we would do, we must seek the effectual assistance of his special grace. In all other cases the Lord marks with disapprobation men's violations of agreements, and refusal of obedience to those whom his providence has placed over them: and perfidious attempts for deliverance, from trouble or thraldom, commonly terminate in deeper misery and ruin.

V. 7—23.

When God arises to judgment, all opposition is vain, and only tends to prolong or increase misery. He keeps an exact register of our advantages, as well as of our sins and their aggravations: and when the day of retribution arrives, he will produce the whole account; that all the world may see "he hath not done without cause, all that he hath done" against the workers of iniquity: for the day of his wrath will be the revelation of his righteous judgment; and indeed his justice in the temporal sufferings of guilty nations is frequently evidenced in the same manner. (Note, Ez. 14:22, 23.)—No authority or example can bear men out in breaking the commandments of God: but the judgments which they have known to be executed upon sinners; the favors conferred on themselves; and the testimony of the Lord's ministers, warning, exhorting, and inviting them to repent and to turn to God, will aggravate the guilt of those, who harden their hearts in disobedience.—Enormous as the outward wickedness of the world evidently is, the secret crimes, and sinful thoughts, desires, and purposes of mankind are immensely worse.—Murders, rapines, adulteries, thefts, robberies, and treason, are atrocious evils, which, for the good of society, are marked with a black brand of infamy: yet, in the balance of unbiassed reason, as well as in holy writ, ingratitude and enmity to God, proud rebellion against him, and contempt, neglect, or defiance of him; and all the idolatry, or impiety, which result from these propensities, violate still higher obligations, with far deeper malignity, and spring from the worst state of the heart imaginable. These evils will therefore be peculiarly considered, in the condemnation of the wicked: especially of such as have been favored with revelation, and the ordinances of God; and who have been his professed people, outwardly dedicated to him, and admitted into covenant with him.—Without turning from every evil way, and unreservedly keeping the commandments and statutes of God, there can be no true godliness: yet, this conversion must spring from a belief of his testimony, both concerning "his wrath revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men," and con erning his mercy in Jesus Christ, to all who re-ent and embrace this salvation. The rejection f his statutes and covenant is always the effect f unbelief; through which sinners harden their earts against the fear of God, exclude the desire f his favor, and obstinately set themselves to reak his commandments; and thus following ly-ng vanities, become worthless and base, like their orldly idols.—When sinners have resolutely turn-d away from God, they not only commit those ins, which promise present advantage or gratifi-ation; but they transgress without any conceiv-ble temptation, as if they purposely devised to rovoke the Lord to anger: and, having sold emselves to do evil, they serve Satan, with great-r self-denial, and violence done to their most ra-onal natural affections, than ever could be re-uired of them in the service of God. He pecu-arly abhors those, who seduce or drive others, by ny means, from following him, and cause them to n against him; and generations yet unborn may urse the inventors of any false religion, or plaus-ble system of infidelity, as the occasions of their verlasting perdition: nay, bad examples alone ay render men chargeable with this tremendous uilt of murdering the souls of others; for human ature is far more ready to copy the evil than the ood, and to listen to tempters than to monitors. ow circumspectly then should we walk, seeing ch dreadful consequences may ensue, for ages come, in various ways, from our misconduct!

V. 24—41.

When the Lord casts off his professing people, r delivers them into the hands of their enemies, e will take care of his own glory: and he can let eir insulting conquerors know, that they have ot prevailed against them for their own right-ousness, or by their own power; but that he has en provoked by the sins of those who were call-d by his name, to give their enemies power gainst them. (Notes and P. O. 1 Sam. 5: 6:)—All tional creatures ought to serve their Creator: nd the very heathen, who honor not his "eternal ower and Godhead," and are not thankful for his oodness, are left without excuse: (Note, Rom. 1: 3—20.) yet, that ignorance, which springs from comparative want of the means of instruction, an alleviation of the sinner's guilt, and will lead effectually for the mitigation of his punish-ent; and the nearer any approach to "the valley vision," the more inexcusable will they be, if ey continue irreligious, or attached to absurd nd cruel superstitions.—The terror of the Al-ighty sometimes induces unconverted sinners to forced or feigned submission: but, when in-ructed by ignorant or hypocritical teachers, ey form very unworthy thoughts of God; expect please him by an outside form and a lip-labor; nd endeavor to reconcile his service with that of Mammon, the love of the world, and the indulg-nce of their darling lusts. Thus, slavish fear nited with ignorance, produces an unwilling orship, with the worthless dregs of men's time nd spirits, when the prime of them have been ent and exhausted in pursuits and pleasures more agreeable to their carnal minds; and they remain destitute of true repentance, faith, love, and devotedness to God. This kind of religion abounds from age to age, being congenial to the human heart, meeting with little disquietude from the natural conscience, and exciting no opposition from the world; or from Satan, who willingly compounds to give up a part, for a time, that he may at length engross the whole. Yet, even such a worthless form of godliness is less dishonorable to the Lord, than the confident presumption of bold hypocrites and apostates. These come short even of this "fear of God;" and in opposition to the knowledge which they have acquired, they cast his law behind their backs; set his threatenings, his power, and justice at defiance; and despise or abuse his mercies and his promises.—If severe afflictions fail to bring such men to repentance, (an effect which they seldom produce,) their ruin will be inevitable and most tremendous. But, may that "fear of the LORD which is the beginning of wisdom," possess our hearts and influence our conduct, that we may be ready for every change! Our worldly settlements are precarious: we know not whither we may be driven before we die; and we must soon leave this world: then "the wicked will be driven away in his wickedness, but the righteous hath hope in his death;" having "chosen that good part, which shall never be taken from him." (Notes, Prov. 14:32. Luke 10:38—42.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XVIII. V. 1. Hoshea seems to have been placed on the throne above four years before the death of Ahaz; but his establishment in quiet possession of the kingdom might take place some time after, from which the third year here mentioned was reckoned. (Notes, 9,10. 15:30. 17:1.) For it is not likely that Hezekiah reigned a year along with his father.

V. 2. Twenty and five, &c.] If we suppose that Ahaz at his death had nearly completed his thirty-seventh year, and Hezekiah was only entering on his twenty-fifth when he began to reign, Ahaz must have been under thirteen years of age, when his son was born! (16:1,2.) But there are on record well-attested instances, especially in those climates, of men having children at as early a period: and there seems to have been a peculiar wisdom of Providence displayed in this uncommon circumstance; for thus Ahaz had a son of mature age to succeed him, when he had filled up so speedily the measure of his iniquities. And as Hezekiah was about nine years of age at the death of Jotham his grandfather, perhaps some good seed, which that pious prince had sown in his tender mind, might conduce to the excellency of his character. (Note, 16:3,4.)

V. 3. After the example of David, Hezekiah was sincerely and inwardly devoted to God; he delighted in his service, and persevered in promoting the cause of true religion to the end of his days: and, while preserved from scandalous offences, such as David had been betrayed into, he

V. 4. We shall hereafter meet with a fuller account of Hezekiah's reformation.—(Notes, 2 Chr. 29:—31:)—His father had set him a very bad example, and probably had given him as bad an education: yet he came to the throne a confirmed servant of God, full of zeal for his glory, and confidence in his protection and assistance. Isaiah began to prophesy in the reign of Uzziah, or Azariah: (Notes, Is. 1:1. 6:1—4.) and it is highly probable, that Hezekiah became attached to him during Ahaz's life-time; and received from him those instructions, which, by the blessing of God, rendered him so illustrious an example of genuine piety, wisdom, and holiness, as he proved, notwithstanding the wickedness of his father. The prophet had occasionally been sent to Ahaz; but he was the friend and counsellor of Hezekiah.—In this reformation, he not only removed the monuments of idolatry, which abounded through the wickedness of Ahaz, his predecessor; but he suppressed the irregular worship upon the high places, which had subsisted, and been connived at, even by the pious kings of Judah, for many ages: and in doing this he must have risked much opposition even from his own subjects.—One instance of Judah's idolatry, and of Hezekiah's reformation, is mentioned in this place alone. The brazen serpent had been preserved by Israel, as a monument of the miracles wrought by means of it in behalf of their forefathers, in order to excite their gratitude, and encourage their faith and hope. (Notes, Num. 21:6—9. John 3:14,15.) We are not informed where it was placed; but it seems that after a time the people stupidly and wickedly made an idol of it, and burnt incense to it; as if it had wrought the cures, instead of being the external sign of the powerful and merciful interposition of the Lord. Hezekiah finding this idolatry deeply rooted, destroyed the brazen serpent, and called it Nehushtan, or a piece of brass; (marg.) by way of exposing the folly of those who worshipped it, when it was of no more value or efficacy than any other piece of brass.—The superstitious veneration paid to sacred relics in the Christian church, and especially the adoration paid to the form of the cross, and even in express words to the wood and nails of it, with all the impostures which have arisen from that absurd idolatry, have been exactly parallel to the worship of the brazen serpent; and Hezekiah's example fully authorizes the total abolition or disuse of every thing of that kind in religious worship. There were no relics under the Old Testament-church, except the pot of manna, Aaron's rod, and this brazen serpent. The two former were preserved by God's own appointment, but they were concealed in the holy of holies from popular inspection: the other was preserved by human contrivance, and became an occasion of idolatry, until a pious king, who doubtless recollected with reverence and gratitude the event commemorated by it, destroyed it with decided abhorrence. And there never were any relics preserved in the Christian church, however good the intention of the preserver might be, which have not issued in such abuses, superstitions, and impositions, as must cause all judicious friends to the gospel to unite in earnestly praying for their extirpation. Yet, true piety, and fervent affection for holy things and holy men, naturally lead this way; unless sound judgment, and considerable acquaintance with human nature, and the history of superstition, counteract their efficacy.

V. 5, 6. None of the kings of Judah, from the time of the division of the kingdom, equalled Hezekiah, in the vigor and simplicity of his dependence upon the Lord; in which he aspired to an equality with his progenitor David, who had reigned over the whole land. Even Asa, through weakness of faith, sought the assistance of a heathen prince; and Jehoshaphat formed an alliance with idolatrous Ahab: but Hezekiah clave to the Lord in entire confidence and unreserved obedience, to the end of his life. (Notes, 22:1,2. 1 Kings 15: 17—24. 2 Chr. 16:7—12. 19:1—4.)

V. 7. Ahaz had basely made the land tributary to the king of Assyria, to purchase his assistance against the Israelites and Syrians: but Hezekiah, who was under no personal engagements to that prince, would not stand to the agreement which his father had formed. (Notes, 16:7—9. 17: 3,4.) Having set about a complete reformation of religion, and confiding in the Lord's assistance, he refused submission to any foreign potentate: and, as the king of Assyria would call this rebelling against him, that term is here used. But it does not appear that Hezekiah violated any treaties; and the king of Assyria could have no just claim to rule over the king of Judah. Some think, however, that he was too precipitate in this measure; being rather elated by his prosperity in other transactions.

V. 8. (Marg. Ref.) The Philistines had recovered strength, in the unsettled state of affairs in Israel and Judah; but Hezekiah again reduced them to subjection. (2 Chr. 28:18. Is. 9:12. Note, Is. 14:28—32.)

V. 9—12. Shalmaneser began the siege of Samaria, in the beginning of the fourth year of Hezekiah, and the seventh of Hoshea; so that the three years' siege was concluded, by the end of the sixth of the former, and the ninth of the latter prince. (Notes, 1. 17:1—11.)—The desolations of Israel would tend to dispose the Jews to concur with Hezekiah, and thus facilitate his endeavors for reformation, as well as quicken him in them.

V. 13. A few years after the reduction of Samaria, Shalmaneser died, and was succeeded by his son Sennacherib. Shalmaneser doubtless would have attempted to subjugate Hezekiah; but he was otherwise employed, and this leisure was given to Hezekiah, to effect his reformation without interruption. (Notes, 2 Chr. 29:—31:) Sennacherib, as soon as he mounted the throne, emulated his father's military honors, and imitated his example. He therefore purposed to treat Jerusalem and Judah, as Shalmaneser had done Samaria and Israel: and it pleased God to chastise the lukewarmness, hypocrisy, or reluctancy, with which many of the Jews concurred in Hezekiah's reformation, and to try his faith, and that of other believers, by permitting this potent monarch to reduce the other fenced cities and strong holds of Judah, and to threaten Jerusalem with a siege. (Notes, 2 Chr. 32:1. Is. 7:17—25. 8:6—8. 10:5—14,28—34. 36:1,2.)

V. 14—16. Some expositors charge Hezekiah with criminality, in revolting from the king of Assyria; but he seems rather to have sinned by yielding to him in so timid a manner. He evidently distrusted God's protection: (Note, Gen. 12:11—16.) and by confessing to the haughty conqueror, that he had offended, and was ready to submit to any imposition that he laid upon him; and by hiring his departure with his own treasures, and the gold of the temple, he invited and encouraged his further impositions. The event shews, that if he had boldly stood out, and committed his cause to God, he would have been protected. But though Hezekiah's conduct might perhaps be reprehensible; yet it served to render Sennacherib's subsequent violence more inexcusable.—Probably, Ahaz had cut off the gold from the doors and pillars of the temple, and Hezekiah had replaced it: yet he too, in this emergency, cut it off to purchase peace. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 2 Chr. 32:3—8.)

V. 17. This second invasion is computed by some learned men to have been three years after the former agreement; during which time Sennacherib was occupied in other wars. But it seems more probable from the narrative, that he returned the ensuing year. (Note, Is. 36:2.) Having, however, accomplished his other projects, and being lifted up with pride, he was determined, without provocation, to reduce Judah and Jerusalem, and to treat the inhabitants as his father had done those of Samaria. (Notes, Is. 10:8—14. 33:5—9.) He therefore sent his commanders with a large army to encamp against that city, being himself engaged in besieging Lachish; (2 Chr. 32:9.) and they were instructed to summon Hezekiah to surrender at discretion, having doubtless particular orders what to say to him or his envoys, on that subject.

V. 19. Rabshakeh, &c.] This man is reported by tradition to have been an apostate Jew; which supposition, if well grounded, may account both for his fluency in speaking the Hebrew tongue, and concerning the God of Israel; and for his imbittered enmity against true religion.

V. 20, 21. It does not appear that Hezekiah, after the preceding agreement, had refused to pay tribute to the king of Assyria, or had attempted to shake off his yoke: but when he found him determined to destroy Jerusalem and enslave its inhabitants, he refused to surrender at discretion, and prepared to stand a siege; and this was deemed rebellion, and the most unreasonable presumption! (Note, 1 Kings 20:2—11.)—Rabshakeh supposed that Hezekiah had neither counsel nor strength for such a war: and indeed he did not place his dependence on his own wisdom, or on the number and valor of his troops.—Hoshea had confided in the king of Egypt, and had been deceived and ruined by that confidence: (Note, 17:4.) and if Hezekiah had done the same, he might have proved to him like a bruised cane, which deceives those who lean upon it, and not only lets them fall, but pierces or wounds their hands. (Note, Ez. 29:6, 7.) He, however, had not put his trust in Egypt for chariots and horsemen; though probably many of his nobles were disposed to that measure, and some engagements of that kind had before been attempted. (Notes, Is. 30:1—7. 31:1—5.)—Vain words. (20) "Word of the lips." Marg.

V. 22. The Assyrians had learned that Hezekiah professed to confide in God: and Rabshakeh combatted that confidence, by inquiring how he could presume to expect assistance from him, whose altars and high places he had destroyed? (Notes, 4. 2 Chr. 31:1.) For he ignorantly supposed that the Lord would be pleased, and deem himself honored, in proportion to the number of the temples and altars dedicated to him, though erected contrary to his express command; and therefore he concluded that Hezekiah had forfeited God's protection, by that very reformation which ensured it. (Notes, Num. 23:1,2,4—6. 1 Cor. 2:14—16.) As none of the kings who supported the worship of JEHOVAH and reformed religion, had ventured to take away the high places, this gave the greater plausibility to the objection. (Note, 4.)

V. 23, 24. If Hezekiah would give security that he would submit in case of failure, Rabshakeh vaunted that he would send him two thousand horses, provided he could find men to ride them. By this he meant to insult and expose Hezekiah's inability to resist the immense army of Sennacherib; or even a small detachment of it, under the command of the least of his captains. But the Israelites were forbidden to multiply chariots and horses, and Hezekiah had learned to depend on a firmer support. (2 Chr. 32:6—8. Notes, Deut. 17:16 Ps. 20:6—8.)

V. 25. Rabshakeh intended to discourage the people, and to induce them to a revolt. Samaria had been destroyed according to the denunciations of JEHOVAH, and Shalmaneser had been considered as his instrument in that destruction. The Jews also were menaced with judgments for their sins, and Rabshakeh affected to believe, that Sennacherib was commissioned to execute similar vengeance on Jerusalem. (Note 2 Chr. 35:20—24. Is. 36:10.) But there was no truth in his assertion, which the late effectual reformation might inspire the people with confidence to disregard: and the impiety of pretending, that Sennacherib came by the command of JEHOVAH, when he was entirely instigated by ambition, resentment, and rapacity, and when he treated God himself in the most blasphemous manner, was horrible profaneness. (Notes, 19 4,25—28. 2 Chr. 32:9—16, v. 15,17—22, v. 19 Is. 10:5—15.)

V. 26. The ambassadors fully understood the drift of Rabshakeh's discourse, and reasonably and mildly required him to make his proposals to them in the Syrian language; and not to address himself to the people, who were no

27 But Rabshakeh said unto them, Hath my master sent me to thy master, and to thee, to speak these words? hath he not sent me to the men which sit on the wall, that they may [y] eat their own dung, and drink * their own piss with you?

28 Then [z] Rabshakeh stood and cried with a loud voice in the Jews' language, and spake, saying, Hear the word of [a] the great king, the king of Assyria.

29 Thus saith the king, [b] Let not Hezekiah deceive you: for he shall not be able to deliver you out of his hand:

30 Neither let Hezekiah [c] make you trust in the LORD, saying, The LORD will surely deliver us, and [d] this city shall not be delivered into the hand of the king of Assyria.

31 Hearken not to Hezekiah: for thus saith the king of Assyria, † Make an agreement with me by a present, and come out to me, and then [e] eat ye every man of his own vine, and every one of his fig-tree, and drink ye every one the waters of his ‡ cistern:

32 Until [f] I come and take you away to a land [g] like your own land, a land of corn and wine, a land of bread and vineyards, a land of oil-olive and of honey, that ye may live, and not die: and hearken not unto Hezekiah, when he § persuadeth you, saying, The LORD will deliver us.

33 Hath [h] any of the gods of the nations delivered at all his land out of the hand of the king of Assyria?

34 Where are [i] the gods of Hamath, and of Arpad? where are [k] the gods of Sepharvaim, Hena, and Ivah? [l] have they delivered Samaria out of mine hand?

35 Who are they, among all the gods of the countries, that have delivered their country out of mine hand, [m] that the LORD should deliver Jerusalem out of mine hand?

36 But the people [n] held their peace, and answered him not a word: for the king's commandment was, saying, Answer him not.

proper judges in such matters, by speaking in the language of the Jews. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 27. These were hyperbolical expressions, denoting the utmost extremities of famine, which the people must expect to endure, in case they dared to resist the king of Assyria. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.)

V. 28—35. Rabshakeh supposed that the Assyrian monarchs had overpowered the gods, as well as the kings, of all the nations which they had subjected; and that JEHOVAH was no more powerful than the rest of them: and therefore if the Jews regarded Hezekiah's persuasions, and expected help from the LORD, they would certainly be deceived, for he would never be able to deliver them. What mean thoughts of the infinite God, and what arrogant thoughts of himself, must have possessed the mind of Sennacherib, who doubtless had instructed his servant to speak of him in this style! The gods of Hamath, &c. were mere idols, not able to do good or evil. The people of Samaria had provoked the Lord to sell them into the hands of their enemies; and the idols, which they had chosen, were indeed unable to defend them: but, soon after, the new inhabitants experienced to their loss, that the God of their land could, if he had so pleased, have delivered Samaria out of the hand of the king of Assyria. (17:25,26. 19:17—19. 2 Chr. 32:19.) Surely, if this proud worm had not been intoxicated with success, he must have admitted, that somewhere in the universe there was a power superior to that of mortal man! and if so, it must be highly irrational thus to set at defiance "all that was called God, or worshipped!" But, by this blasphemy the Lord was expressly engaged in the cause; and his honor required him to crush the self-important wretch, who dared to exalt himself against him: so that the greatest kindness imaginable was done to the king and the people of Judah, by this language of impiety and defiance. (Notes, 19:4,14—19, v. 19, 25—29. Ps. 79:8—13. Is. 10:15—19.)—The proposal made to the people was not very alluring, unless they could be previously terrified with the dread of impending destruction: for Rabshakeh avowed the intention of extorting more money from them; and only of permitting them to continue in their own land, till the king had leisure to remove them to another: and the fertility of that other country was not likely to be very useful to those, who were to be captives and slaves in it. But who could have depended upon the word of such a man, if he had made more equitable proposals?—Rabshakeh, however, argued very plausibly on his own principles, and his eloquence has been much admired: but when a man addresses himself to an uninformed populace, and has sufficient effrontery, and no reserves as to what he says, be it ever so false, impious, or malignant, provided it is suited to inflame their passions, to excite their fears or terrors, and to set them against the rulers whom God has placed over them; eloquence requires comparatively no great talent or genius.

V. 36, 37. Hezekiah was aware what sort of language Rabshakeh would employ, and had wisely counselled his envoys, and commanded the people, to hold their peace; lest they should get engaged in a reviling contention, or provoke him to further impiety. 'This was a wise 'order; ... and it was no less pious: for Hezekiah 'believed that God would answer for himself, not 'in words, but in such deeds as would demonstrate 'that he was above all gods.' Bp. Patrick. In abhorrence, however, of his blasphemy, and in grief for the afflicted estate of the nation, the ambassadors rent their clothes, and returned to the king. (Notes, Is. 33:7—13.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

In times of increasing impiety we should not despond, as if things must necessarily proceed from bad to worse; for the Lord is able to give them an unexpected and effectual turn. From the most abandoned families he sometimes raises up the brightest ornaments and most useful friends of true religion, to illustrate the sovereignty and power of his grace: and when parents have been notoriously profane and wicked, their children should not hesitate to express, by an opposite conduct, a decided disapprobation of their crimes, and to counteract to the utmost the effects of them on others; whether they have occupied a public, or a more private station in society: for, when the honor of God is concerned, the reputation of the nearest relatives is entitled to a very subordinate regard. (Notes, Matt. 10:37—39. Luke 14:25—27. 2 Cor. 5:16. Note and P. O. 1 Pet. 1:17—21.)—It is not enough, that we do not imitate the conduct of atrocious offenders, or that we tread in the steps of those, who have upon the whole served God sincerely: but we should aim high; and, in aspiring at that eminence which the Scripture proposes, we should set before our eyes the most approved patterns, whose actions are there recorded; that we may follow those who have most nearly followed Christ, and most effectually served God and their generation; and thus become good examples for others to copy. (Note, 1 Thes. 1:5—8.)—In attempting personal or public reformation, those things should be removed or avoided, which have proved occasions of evil, though not sinful in themselves. Human depravity is prone to pervert the bounty of Providence into fuel for sinful lusts; and, in some circumstances, is equally propense to abuse the peculiar mercies of God into occasions of superstition and idolatry. It is natural to fallen man to put the creature in the place of the Creator, and to regard the instrument, rather than the Author, of our comforts: and though this is more evidently absurd when the instrument is irrational or inanimate; it is equally idolatrous, when the most exalted of intelligent agents are thus unduly honored. However excellent, useful, or deserving of honor, such creatures have been; when they are thus idolized, their comparative meanness and worthlessness ought to be exposed, and the abuse of them treated with the deepest indignation and abhorrence: nay, it were better that the most exalted creature should perish, than that God should be dishonored by having the least of his glory given to another. Much more then, should every monument of his former mercies be extirpated, when it becomes the occasion of fatal delusions; and the perversion cannot otherwise effectually be prevented: but the propriety of such a measure is still more conspicuous, when the relic, or the custom, was originally the creature of superstition, a mere human invention, perhaps the result of fraud and imposture. True faith needs not such aids to devotion: the word of God, daily meditated upon, leads the mind to realize past, future, and invisible things, as if present: thus every good end proposed by other expedients is answered, without the danger to which they expose us; and the simple scriptural use of the sacramental signs, and pledges of heavenly things, may effectually be preserved from such abuse, and answer every purpose, which can be obtained by presenting the objects of our faith to our bodily senses, in any way not warranted by the word of God; which only tends to distract the mind, to interrupt the simple exercise of faith, to excite spurious affections, to deprave the imagination with gross and false notions of heavenly things, and to introduce, either absurd superstition, or wild enthusiasm.—Those, who most entirely trust in God, will feel themselves most effectually emancipated from other dependences, and from the dominion of every other master; and will be encouraged to resist every enemy and rival, "that they may cleave to the LORD, and not depart from following him, and keeping his commandments."

V. 9—16.

While the interests of religion decline or are run down in one place, the Lord takes care that they shall revive and flourish in another. The judgments, which desolate degenerate churches and nations, instead of injuring his cause, tend to warm, animate, and embolden others in personal religion, and in attempting public reformation; nay, they often facilitate the work of active instruments in religious revivals, by intimidating opposers, and exciting those who were indifferent, or reluctant to assist.—Yet, the believer, when pursuing heavenly things, and seeking the glory of God, with the greatest simplicity and most vigorous affections, must stand prepared for trouble. For a time, he may enjoy the sunshine of peace and prosperity, to encourage him in his labor of love, and to enable him to bring it to some establishment; and "whatsoever he doeth" shall eventually "prosper." But, when the Almighty is pleased to remove his restraining hand, Satan and wicked men will assault him, with rancor and vehemence proportioned to his zeal and success: and the Lord often permits them to do this; for he regards not so much the present transient feelings of his beloved servants, as the final happy and glorious event of their trials and conflicts. Nations also may meet with public calamities, when true religion is most vigorously and successfully promoted, by the general concurrence of all orders of men. (Notes, 2 Chr. 20:1—4. Ps. 44:17—22.) The secret dislike, the hypocrisy, and the lukewarmness of numbers, require correction: while trials tend to purify the faith and hope of upright persons; to bring them to greater simplicity in their zeal for the honor of God, and in their dependence on his help; and to increase the fervency of their addresses at the throne of grace: and thus they make way for the fuller display of the glory of God in their deliverance. Yet, in such trying situations the strongest believers are apt to waver, to make improper concessions, and to speak and act unadvisedly.—Whatever is withheld or withdrawn from God, which has been or ought to be devoted to him, in order to purchase exemption from trouble, or peace with the enemies of his church, will eventually occasion our shame, and involve us in greater difficulties.

V. 17—37.

No dependence can be placed on the engagements of the covetous or ambitious: and all attempts to purchase their favor, or to soothe them into peace, are vain. When it is in their power they will find some pretence for seizing on those possessions which they covet, while every acquisition increases their insatiable rapacity. Success in wickedness elates them with pride and insolence; they forget that they are men, or have any superior; and treat all as enemies or rebels who do not implicitly comply with their exorbitant demands. Our only safety then consists, in committing our persons, property, connexions, reputations, liberty, and every thing which we value, into the powerful keeping of our God, in the exercise of faith, and by adhering to the path of duty.—"The tongue is an unruly evil, full of deadly poison; it setteth on fire the whole course of nature and is set on fire of hell." What pride, reproaches, lies, impiety, atheism, and blasphemy have, in all ages, been vented by it, to the dishonor of God, and the unutterable injury of mankind! We may form some estimate of the desperate wickedness of the human heart, from the horrible language which is uttered by the lips of men; "for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." (Notes, Matt. 12:31—37. Jam. 3:3—6.) May the Lord replenish our hearts with his grace, that out of that good treasure we may speak such things, and such only, as may "minister grace unto the hearers!" If indeed, "as the fool hath said in his heart, there were no God," it would in general be vain and presumptuous for the weaker to resist the stronger: but, as "the LORD doeth what he will in the armies of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth;" so, "the race is not always to the swift nor the battle to the strong." All confidence in man may justly be exploded, as leaning on a broken staff, which will not only fail, but also wound: and dependence on our own counsel and might, whatever proportion they may bear to those of our opponents, is equally vain and fallacious. But our God never fails those who trust in him: in his confidence the believer, when more conscious of his own extreme debility, than his insulting foes can conceive, may boldly defy the most potent of them; and if they deride this dependence on the omnipotent God, they only engage him, "for his own name's sake," the more decisively to fight against them; and to turn their vauntings and threatenings, into confusion, dismay, and ruin.—When they, who have domineered over their fellow worms, presume to assault those whom the God of heaven protects; they will soon feel their inability to resist his power, or to endure the weight of his indignation. Yet many who theistically, or impiously, deny his existence, blaspheme his truths, or condemn his authority; inconsistently, upon other occasions, advance claims to his favor, and express their expectations that he will prosper their wicked devices! Because they have succeeded in exposing or reducing hypocritical and degenerate professors of Christianity; they triumph as if they had, or soon should, completely ruin the cause of vital godliness, and prevail against the house of David and his kingdom, which is founded upon an immoveable foundation. Numbers also, ignorantly and absurdly, suppose those things to be pleasing to God, which he most abhors; because they form their judgment on the deductions of their own understandings, or on the traditions and authority of men, and not on the plain and sure testimonies of the sacred scriptures. "For the things of the Spirit of God are foolishness to the natural man." Hence they embolden themselves, and endeavor to discourage scriptural worshippers, upon the most false and preposterous grounds. Such cavils, objections, and arguments have no weight with the established believer: and therefore these men pretend to despise him, that they may address the prejudices and passions of the ignorant, unstable, and unthinking multitude, with whom their specious declamations go further, than either solid arguments or scriptural testimonies. They endeavor to insinuate, that the persons, who labor to prevail with them to trust and serve God, according to the plain meaning of his holy word, are deceivers, to whom they cannot safely attend: and, while they are only aiming at the gratification of their own ambition or avarice, they profess great compassion and kindness for them, are lavish of good words, and set before them alluring prospects of felicity. But, it is often best to leave persons of this description to rail and blaspheme, without directly answering: because such attempts ordinarily increase their self-importance, and tend to disseminate still more widely the effect of their poisonous tenets; while a decided expression of abhorrence of their guilt generally forms the best testimony against them. The matter must be left to the Lord, who has all hearts in his hands: he will plead his own cause, and that of his truth and people; and our safety and duty consist in committing ourselves into his hands, by humble submission, believing hope, and fervent prayer.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIX. V. 1. Hezekiah, by rending his garments and clothing himself in sackcloth, expressed his abhorrence of Rabshakeh's blasphemy; his grief for the afflictions of his people; and his humble consciousness of his own and his people's unworthiness, and need of pardoning mercy; while he wholly depended upon God for protection.

V. 2. Isaiah had at this time prophesied almost fifty years, if he entered upon that office only a short time before the death of Uzziah: for he prophesied, in the days of Uzziah, who died about 758 before Christ; and these transactions occurred about 712. (Notes, Is. 1:1. 6:1—4, v. 1.) It must be supposed that Hezekiah had often consulted him: and the nature of this message implies a previous acquaintance, and a mutual confidence. (Note, 18:4.) Isaiah's visits to Hezekiah, at and after his sickness, are thought by some to have taken place before this, though recorded afterwards: (20:) and many parts of his prophecy evidently refer to these events.—In this emergency therefore Hezekiah sent to Isaiah the prophet, rather than to the high priest; though he had employed the priests and Levites in his reformation. Perhaps Urijah was still living, or some other high priest too much resembling him in character. (Note, 16:10—16.) There seems, however, to have been an intended slight upon the high priest. Some learned men indeed think, that the appointed method of inquiring of God

3 And they said unto him, Thus saith Hezekiah, [h] This day is a day of trouble, and of rebuke, and [*] blasphemy: [i] for the children are come to the birth, and there is not strength to bring forth.

5 So the servants of king Hezekiah came to Isaiah.

6 And [p] Isaiah said unto them, Thus shall ye say to your master, Thus saith the LORD, [q] Be not afraid of the words which thou hast heard, with which [r] the servants of the king of Assyria have blasphemed me.

by the high priest, was disused from the time that the temple was built: but this can only be collected from the silence of Scripture, as no express declaration to that effect is recorded.—Shebna, who was employed on this occasion, as well as in receiving the message of Rabshakeh, is elsewhere represented in an unfavorable light. (Notes, Is. 22:15—19.) For pious persons cannot always employ such characters, and such only, as they approve. The elders of the priests accompanied the chief officers of the king, in going to the prophet: and they all went to him in the habit of mourners and penitents.

V. 3. It was not only a season of great distress to Israel; but the confidence of the king, in the protection of God, was rebuked by Rabshakeh in the name of Sennacherib, as a groundless presumption, and the name of JEHOVAH was blasphemed on that account. Indeed the affairs of Judah were come to a crisis: every thing valuable was at stake. As the woman in travail, who has not strength to bring forth, must die, if she be not speedily assisted; so, Hezekiah and his people, in their pressing necessity, were utterly unable to do any thing effectual to extricate themselves, and must perish without immediate help from God. (Note, Hos. 13:12,13.)

V. 4. Hezekiah's confidence in God was in some respects encouraged by the blasphemy of the Assyrians. For though he and his people were unworthy of the divine favor; yet it was proper for the Lord to rebuke and silence the reproachful words which had been spoken. In this hope therefore he entreated and required the prophet to "lift up his prayer," with earnestness and importunity, for the remnant which was left, that the people of God might not be swallowed up and extirpated. Israel had been carried into captivity, and dispersed; and Judah was reduced to extremities: and would God suffer his blasphemers finally to prevail against his worshippers, and entirely to destroy his holy religion? (Notes, Is. 8:6—8. 10:5,6.)

V. 7. A blast, &c.] Some have supposed that this expression related to the manner, in which the Assyrian army was destroyed: viz. by exciting one of those scorching winds, which in those countries have been known to destroy great multitudes almost instantaneously. But this is uncertain: and perhaps it only means, that the Lord would destroy all his prosperity, as easily as the pinching gale of wind blasts the tender vegetables: while the death of his numerous forces, probably attended by a report, that Tirhakah and the Ethiopians were marching to assault him, as a terrifying rumor in his ears, would hurry him home with dismay and disgrace. (Notes, 35—37. Job 20:10—29, vv. 23—26.)—As the word, rendered blast, is often translated spirit; some explain the expression to mean, that God would send an angel, or spirit, to destroy Sennacherib's army; but others think it signifies, that God would fill his heart with terror by some supernatural agent. "I will infuse a spirit into him."—The phrase 'never signifies any thing, 'but putting a spirit into a person; this was πνευμα 'δειλιας' (a spirit of fear.) Secker in Bp. Lowth.

V. 8. It is probable, that Rabshakeh marched the army back from Jerusalem to join Sennacherib, when he found that Hezekiah would neither surrender, nor return any answer to his insulting message. (32) For Jerusalem was so advantageously situated, and so well fortified, that, with a moderate garrison, it might have made a stout resistance against any detachment of the Assyrian army: (Notes, 25:1—5. 2 Sam. 5:6—8. Ps. 48:12,13. 125:2. Lam. 4:12.) though it must probably at length have shared the fate of Samaria, if the Lord had not immediately interposed. ime he had withdrawn from Lachish, (it is not known whether he had taken that city or not;) nd was besieging Libnah, another city, which efused to open its gates to the conqueror.

V. 9—13. When Sennacherib had, the first ime, levied contributions upon Hezekiah, he narched his army into Egypt; probably in reentment against the king, for forming alliances vith the vassals of the Assyrians, as he regarded he Jews and the Samaritans to be. After several uccesses there, while he was besieging Pelusiim, an important fortress in that country, he eard that Tirhakah king of Ethiopia was marchng against him with a great army: and, not hoosing to wait his approach, he raised the iege; and, returning into Judea, began to comnit hostilities there, as it has been before related. But, finding that Tirhakah pursued him as a fuitive, he marched back to encounter him; and, aving totally routed his army, he returned to vreak his vengeance on Hezekiah and Jerusaem. This gave the Jews some respite for prepration and for prayer; and afforded Sennacherib n occasion for more deliberately uttering his lasphemies, by a letter sent to Hezekiah, when letained for a time from marching against him.—earned men differ in opinion concerning Tirakah; whether he were king of Ethiopia, or Cush, to the south of Egypt in Africa, or of the Cushites in Asia. He was, however, an ally of he king of Egypt. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 18:20, 1,28—35. 1 Kings 10:1,2.)

(14) By this action Hezekiah referred the matter enirely to God, intimating that as his honor was mmediately assaulted, he was chiefly concerned o defend it: and by this appeal the king meant to shelter himself and his people under the shadow of the Almighty; that while the Lord pleaded his own cause, he might also deliver them from their enraged enemies. (Notes, 2 Chr. 20:14—17. Ps. 21:13.)

Thou art the God, &c. (15) JEHOVAH, the God of Israel, who dwells between the cherubim, on the mercy-seat, was considered by Sennacherib and Rabshakeh as merely the local deity of a small region: but Hezekiah prayed, that he would arise, and make it appear that he was the God of all the kingdoms of the earth, and the Creator of the world.

Now, &c. (19) It would have been comparatively a small matter for Hezekiah and his people to perish; but it would be an evil of infinite magnitude, for all the nations to conclude, that JEHOVAH was no more powerful than their worthless idols: and it would be unspeakably honorable to the name of God, to shew the difference between the Creator of the world, and these his puny rivals; and to prove, that he only was the LORD almighty, able to save and to destroy. Sennacherib's blasphemous challenge gave a fair opportunity of publicly demonstrating this most important truth: and a plea grounded so directly on the honor of God could not but prevail. "the daughter of Zion," or of Jerusalem. (Marg. Ref. c.) They were safe under his protection and care, as a virgin-daughter in the house of a wise and tender parent: and, though the Assyrian attempted brutal violence, they might treat his efforts with disdain and defiance; might despise them and laugh them to scorn, and menace his destruction by shaking their heads at him. Perhaps the term, virgin, might refer to the state of Jerusalem, as free from idolatry, and reserved for the Lord alone; (2 Cor. 11:1—6, v 2.) or as having never been exposed to the ravages of an enraged victor. (Notes, Is. 23:12. 47:1—3.) The city of David, or Zion, seems never to have been taken by any assailant, from the time when David got possession of it, till the Babylonish captivity.—The former part of this message is addressed, not to Hezekiah, but to Sennacherib, as if present; first by the daughter of Zion, and then by the Lord himself.

V. 22. Sennacherib had both exalted his voice, in reproach and blasphemy against God; and lifted up his eyes, in pride and ambition; as if he even aspired to his throne, and affected equality with him, or even superiority above him. (Notes, 2 Chr. 32:9—16, v. 15,17—22, v. 19. Is. 10:15—19. Ez. 28:2—10. Dan. 5:18—24. 2 Thes. 2:3,4.) But he did not consider whom he had thus affronted: not the idols of the heathens, which being wood and stone, he had easily cast into the fire; but Israel's holy Protector, who would execute signal vengeance upon him for his bold presumption; and who, being the Creator of heaven and earth, could crush as a moth the feeble worm, which had set him at defiance.

V. 23. The Assyrian monarch was elated by his successes; and, on account of the number and valor of his troops, his chariots, and other military preparations, supposed that nothing would be too hard for him to accomplish. He is here introduced as glorying in what he had done, and would do. No mountain was so inaccessible but he could drive his chariots over it; no forest so impervious, but he could level it with the ground; no place so fortified, but he would force his way into it! Some suppose he meant, that he had marched his army through the defiles, or over the craggy summits, of mount Lebanon: but others think that by these expressions, the temple on mount Zion is intended; and that he gloried, as already indisputably master of the whole land; and as if he had marched his army, and driven his chariots, into the mountain of the Lord's house, and dispossessed him of his habitation. The temple may be called Lebanon, either because difficult of access, or because it was built with cedars of Lebanon: the removal of all obstructions, by slaying the bravest of Hezekiah's captains, may be denoted, by cutting down the cedars and choice fir-trees: and, "the lodgings of his borders, and the forest of his Carmel," may mean the strong-holds upon the borders of the land; and the fruitful fields, which would come into the possession of the conqueror. For Carmel being situated in a very fruitful part of the land, every fruitful spot seems to have been called by that name. (Marg.—Notes, Is. 10:12—15.)

V. 24. Hezekiah had before taken measures to prevent the Assyrians from finding water near Jerusalem. (Note, 2 Chr. 32:3,4.) But this haughty conqueror boasted, that wherever his armies marched to besiege cities, that by digging deep wells he found water where none had ever been found before, so that he and his army had "drunk strange waters:" and likewise, that they dried up all the rivers by which the cities were defended, either by the numbers who drank of them, or by diverting their course into other channels: as if he had been capable of dividing the rivers, that his army might march over; and of bringing waters from the rock, as JEHOVAH had done for his people! (Notes, Ex. 14:26—31. 17:5,6. Josh. 3:15—17.)—The cities of Egypt, where Sennacherib had been very successful, were chiefly defended by rivers or deep moats.

V. 25. When the Lord had declared the vainglorious thoughts of Sennacherib's heart, who affected to be thought invincible and omnipotent; he addressed him as in person, and interrogated him, whether he had never heard that these were the peculiar works of Israel's God: In ancient times, long before Sennacherib, or the ancestors of whom he boasted, were born, JEHOVAH (for the deliverance of his people, and to form them into a nation who should worship him,) had, as it were, levelled mountains: he had literally dried up rivers and seas to afford them a passage; and caused them to drink strange waters flowing from the rock of flint.—Or Sennacherib, in what he had done, had only fulfilled the purposes and predictions of JEHOVAH, as his instrument in his least honorable work of executing vengeance: and this without intending it, and instigated only by his own ambition, rage, and insatiable rapacity. God, in righteousness, had allotted him the service of "laying waste fenced cities into ruinous heaps" which he performed in a most iniquitous manner.—Isaiah's prophecies concerning the Assyrians seem to be herb, as [o] the grass on the house-tops, and as corn blasted before it be grown up.

27 But [p] I know thy * abode, and [q] thy going out, and thy coming in, and thy rage against me.

28 Because [r] thy rage against me, and [s] thy tumult is come up into mine ears, therefore I will put [t] my hook in thy nose, and my bridle in thy lips, and I will turn thee back [u] by the way by which thou camest.

29 And this shall be [x] a sign unto thee, [y] Ye shall eat this year such things as grow of themselves, and in the second year that which springeth of the same; and in the third year, sow ye and reap, and plant vineyards, and eat the fruits thereof.

30 [z] And † the remnant that is escaped of the house of Judah [a] shall yet again take root downward, and bear fruit upward.

31 For [b] out of Jerusalem shall go forth a remnant, and ‡ they that escape out of mount Zion: [c] the zeal of the LORD of hosts shall do this.

32 Therefore thus saith the LORD, concerning the king of Assyria, [d] He shall not come into this city, nor shoot an arrow there, nor come before it with shield, nor [e] cast a bank against it.

33 By the way that he came, by the same shall he return, and shall not come into this city, saith the LORD.

34 For [f] I will defend this city, to save it, [g] for mine own sake, and for [h] my servant David's sake.

referred to. (Notes, Is. 7:17—25. 8:6—10. 10:5—15,24—34. 30:27—32. 33:1—13.)

V. 26. (Note, 9—13.) The Lord had been pleased to enfeeble and intimidate all the enemies, which Sennacherib had hitherto encountered; so that they fell before him as the grass before the scythe; nay, they withered of themselves, "as grass on the house-tops, or as corn blasted before it be grown up." (Note, Ps. 129:6—8.) His success was therefore no decided proof, that he possessed extraordinary power, courage, or conduct; and he had no reason thus to vaunt, as if he had done wonderful things.

V. 27, 28. The Lord knew Sennacherib's secret thoughts and plans, as well as his undertakings; and that he was actuated by implacable enmity against his perfections, authority, worship, and worshippers: especially since Hezekiah, trusting in the Lord, had dared to disregard his menaces and resist his will. This rage had vented itself in blasphemies and reproaches against God; and it had also occasioned insolent threatenings and tumultuous preparations against Jerusalem. But the Lord was about to deal with him by force, as with some savage beast, or untractable horse or mule: he would fasten a hook in his nose, and a bridle in his mouth, and let him know that there was One, infinitely above him; and send him home baffled and disgraced. (Notes, Job 41:1—11. Is. 37:29. Ez. 29:2—5. 38:4.)

V. 29. The Lord here addresses Hezekiah.—The devastations of the Assyrians had, probably, prevented the land from being sown that year; and the next is supposed to have been the sabbatical year; though this is the only intimation, in all the history of Israel, that any regard was paid to that institution: (Note, 2 Chr. 36:2:1.) but the Lord here engaged, that the spontaneous produce of the land, from the corn shaken out, in gathering the preceding harvest, should be sufficient for the support of the people, during those two years, and till a supply was obtained in the ordinary way. (Note, Lev. 25:20—22.)

As the performance of this promise was evidently subsequent to the destruction of Sennacherib's army, it was a sign to Hezekiah's faith, that the present deliverance would be an earnest of the Lord's persevering care of the kingdom of Judah; and of the accomplishment of that part of the promise, which related to events still more remote. (Note, Ex. 3:12.)

V. 30, 31. The ten tribes were already carried captive; Judah was brought very low; Jerusalem alone withstood the victor's arms, and it was menaced with a siege. (Note, Is. 8:6—8.) The professed worshippers of God were a very small remnant, and seemed devoted to ruin. But that remnant would be as seed-corn; which, striking root in a fruitful soil, springs up and yields a large increase. (Note, Is. 27:2—6, v. 6.) They were destined to go forth from mount Zion, to possess the land, and to spread into distant countries; and were a typical resemblance of the apostles and primitive Christians, who from Jerusalem carried the gospel into all the nations of the earth, in order to produce an immense increase of true believers, who are all the children of Abraham, and heirs according to the promise. (Note, Gal. 3:26—29.) This the Lord himself undertook to perform; not because of their righteousness, but out of zeal for his own glory; to make known his perfections, to magnify his law and authority, and to promote his own cause, and increase the number of his worshippers. (Note, Is. 9:6,7.)

V. 32, 33. It is certain from these verses, that Sennacherib never approached near enough to Jerusalem, to lay siege against it, or even to make preparations for a siege: and there is no proof that Rabshakeh or Rabsaris had proceeded to besiege the city; though they had come with an army and menaced it. (Notes, 8, 27,28. 18.17 Is. 33:20—22.)

V. 34. For my servant, &c.] That is, from a gracious regard to David's faith and piety, to perform the promises made to his family, and to

V. 35. Rabshakeh seems to have rejoined the king with his detachment: and, after the victory gained over Tirhakah, Sennacherib marched directly to besiege Jerusalem; and was just arrived and encamped in the neighborhood of that city, but had not made any assault upon it. (Note, 32,33.) And this happened the very night after Hezekiah had spread the letter before God, and sought his help by prayer. The devastation was made with such profound silence, that the survivors were not aware of the blow, till they arose in the morning, and found one hundred and eighty-five thousand of their comrades dead in the camp! "When they arose, . . . these," (the hundred and eighty-five thousand,) "were all dead corpses." Probably, Rabshakeh perished among the rest; but Sennacherib was preserved to still deeper disgrace, and a more dreadful end.—The "angels excel in strength:" this angel was commissioned by divine authority, and armed with adequate power; and it is not requisite for us to determine in what manner he effected this tremendous slaughter. (Notes, Ps. 76: Is. 10:16—19,28—34. 29:5—8. 31:8,9. 33:23,24.)—'Herodotus re-'ports from the Egyptians, that their king, being 'also a priest, by his prayers to his god, brought 'this destruction on the Assyrians, as they lay 'before Pelusium: a great army of rats coming 'in the night, and gnawing all their bow-strings 'in pieces, so that they could not fight. So stu-'dious were they to pervert the truth, and cor-'rupt the sacred story!' Bp. Patrick.

V. 36, 37. Sennacherib is supposed to have survived this catastrophe for some time; and to have lived under great contempt, but exercising the most odious cruelty towards his subjects. Though he had had such awful demonstration of the power of JEHOVAH, and the impotence of his own idols; yet he adhered to the latter, and died in an act of idolatrous worship: a striking example of the difference between the God in whom Hezekiah trusted, to whom he prayed, and by whom he was miraculously delivered, in the most urgent extremity; and the god of Sennacherib, who could not defend him in his own capital, during profound peace, from the sword of his sons, even while employed in acts of religious worship!—Some have conjectured, that Sennacherib had vowed to sacrifice his sons to his idol, and that they murdered him in self-defence: and then escaped into the adjacent mountains of Armenia, or Ararat. (Note, Gen. 8:4,5.)—Esarhaddon seems to have been a man of much better character than his father. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

In times of great distress and prevailing impiety, strong expressions of poignant sorrow and deep humiliation are peculiarly seasonable: for, "the LORD calls to weeping, and mourning, and girding with sackcloth," and the contrary spirit and conduct are irrational, offensive, and tokens of a profane, sensual, and selfish heart. (Note, Is. 22:8—14.)—They, who best know the efficacy of fervent believing prayer, will most desire the supplications of others for them, and especially of those, who have long been eminent for piety and simplicity, and zealous for the glory of God. Alas! few kings are very earnest to form alliances with the faithful and devoted ministers of religion, against their hostile invaders; yet, they are of more real utility, than increasing numbers of brave and disciplined troops: and whenever princes, prophets, and people unite in prayer, in real dependence on God, and a disposition to give him the praise; a prosperous event may be confidently expected, notwithstanding their own weakness, and the rebukes and insults of haughty enemies.—The Lord "resisteth the proud," and will vindicate his own cause against those who reproach, defy, or blaspheme his name; or who rival him, and rob him of his glory.—The more we are humbly conscious, that we cannot help ourselves, but must be miserable and perish without his aid; the more simple will be our dependence on him, and the more fervent our applications to him, whether in temporal or spiritual exigencies.—'Man's extremity is therefore 'God's opportunity:' and while his servants can speak nothing but terror to the proud, the profane, and the hypocritical; they have comfortable words to say to the discouraged believer 'Be not afraid: thine enemies are God's ene-'mies, and thy cause is his cause: in glorifying 'himself, he must protect and save those who 'trust in him. He delights in giving the very 'blessings for which thy soul is athirst: and with 'the breath of his mouth he can slay the wicked, 'and blast all the machinations of earth and hell 'against his church.'—The Lord finds wicked men other employment, when he would give his servants a respite from conflict and persecution: and even those projects, which are in themselves most trifling or most detestable, often so engross the minds, occupy the time, and fill the hands of the ungodly, as to detain them from attempting that mischief to the cause of God, to which otherwise they would be disposed. But their pursuits of wealth, of honor, of pleasure, or of learning, do not prevent their discovering the enmity of their hearts, or filling up the measure of their sins: and when this is done, they are taken away, and their place knows them no more.—The blasphemies, which many utter, are not unmeaning words, as they suppose, but the natural produce of their depraved hearts: and therefore they reiterate them, and grow more outrageous in them, when recent occasions are afforded. Absurd as it appears, worldly men do really think, that those who trust in God will be deceived; and they presume upon success, while they despise him, and set him at defiance! Impunity and prosperity inspire confidence and arrogance; and men expect to prevail against all who resist them, because in some instances they have been successful! (Note, Ec. 8:11—13.)

CHAP. XX.

Hezekiah, when sick, is warned by Isaiah to prepare for death, 1; but praying, he receives the promise of fifteen years added to his life, and of deliverance from the Assyrians, 2—7. In confirmation, the shadow on Ahaz's dial goes back ten degrees, 8—11. The king of Babylon sends to congratulate Hezekiah, who shews the ambassadors all his treasures, 12, 13. Isaiah reproves him for this, and foretels the Babylonish captivity, 14—19. Hezekiah dies, and is succeeded by Manasseh, 20, 21.

IN those days [a] was Hezekiah sick unto death. And [b] the prophet Isaiah the son of Amoz came to him, and said unto him, thus saith the LORD, * Set thine house in order; for [c] thou shalt die, and not live.

V. 14—22.

We can easily say, "If God be for us, who can be against us?" but in the crisis of danger, when the eye of sense perceives no way of escape, without removing mountains, and effecting apparent impossibilities, faith is constrained to maintain a severe conflict against unbelief, even in the experience of the most established believers. But prayer is the never-failing resource of the tempted Christian; whether he be called to struggle with outward difficulties, or to engage in the more distressing warfare with his inward enemies. At the mercy-seat of his almighty Friend he opens his heart; before him he particularly spreads the case; to him he makes his appeal: and when he can discern, that the glory of God is engaged on his side, his faith gains the victory, and he again exults in the assurance, that he never shall be moved. He knows the difference between JEHOVAH, whose mysterious nature and harmonious perfections are revealed in the sacred Scriptures; and all those idols, which are the work of men's hands, or the creatures of their imaginations. Infidels may indeed triumph over superstition, hypocrisy, and every form of worthless profession: and they may vaunt and boast, as if they could, with equal ease and certainty, prevail against the truths and spiritual worship of God our Savior. But, whether they employ the terrors of persecution, or the more specious armor of blasphemous reproaches, sarcastic wit, or proud reasonings; their assaults are vain against the faith and prayers, the holy lives, and scriptural preaching of the Lord's true servants. "The weapons of our warfare are mighty through God," not only to repel the assaults of Satan and his ministers, whether they assume the form of the roaring lion, the subtle serpent, or the angel of light; but to subvert his strongholds, and "to cast down imaginations," (or reasonings,) "and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and to bring into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ." (Note, 2 Cor. 10:1—6.)—No weapon that is formed against the church can prosper: and the daughter of Zion, whilst untainted with idolatry or hypocrisy, and faithfully reserving herself for him, who has "espoused her in righteousness, and faithfulness, and loving kindness," may despise and defy the feeble efforts of all assailants, and confidently predict their speedy and terrible destruction. Oh, that such persons would consider, "whom they have reproached and blasphemed!" whom they have opposed and provoked to wrath! "against whom they have exalted their voice, and lifted up their eyes on high!" They may think that he is altogether such a one as themselves: but they will find, that he is "the Holy One of Israel." He sees their inmost thoughts; he discerns the rage and enmity of their hearts; as well as hears the stout and arrogant words, which they instigate each other to speak against him: and what will they do, when from his awful tribunal he shall give the mandate, "These mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither, and slay them before me?" (Note, Luke 19:11—27, v. 27.)

V. 23—37.

The greatest exploits of men are unworthy of notice, compared with the most ordinary works of God: the most powerful and successful of his enemies undesignedly accomplish his secret purposes, or express predictions; and prosper, only till they have filled up their part of his universal plan. Some the Lord employs, contrary to their own intentions, as executioners of his vengeance, "to lay waste fenced cities into ruinous heaps;" and therefore their opposers prove weak, timid, or infatuated: but, when they have accomplished their work, (perhaps with hearts full of rage against him, who had exalted and prospered them;) their turn comes next, and others execute vengeance upon them: or he deals with them by his own hand, as with some great Behemoth or Leviathan, and restrains, confines, or enfeebles them, as he sees good. But his believing people, safe under his protection, and living upon his grace and providential bounty, are employed as willing instruments to perform his works of goodness and mercy, which when finished shall meet a sure reward. Whilst all creatures here below subserve their good; and nature itself is made to transcend her usual limits, or alter her settled course, to supply their wants; and while the mighty angels are all ministering spirits, sent forth to protect them, or avenge them on their enemies: they, in their places, would imitate that prompt obedience, and "delight to do the commandments" of God, "hearkening unto the voice of his word."—But all creatures, yea, the holy angels, and the Lord of angels himself, fight against those who fight against his church: nay, those objects on which they chiefly depend, and those persons from whom they expect the greatest kindness, will concur in effecting their destruction; and every respite will finally add to their infamy and misery.—The cause of God, however reduced, will surely revive: the remnant of every generation will yield an increase to that which succeeds; and at length "Israel shall blossom, and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit." The zeal of the Lord of hosts, which appointed and sent the mighty Savior, is engaged to make his salvation triumphant over all opposers, and to fill the earth with the knowledge of his glory: not now for "his servant David's sake," but for the sake of his "beloved Son, in whom he is well pleased." May our hearts be prepared as good ground, that his word may strike root in them, and bring forth fruit in our lives! then we shall witness the full completion of all those prophecies, of which he has already given us so many signs and earnests, while with exulting millions we shall sing, "Hallelujah! the Lord God omnipotent reigneth:" and "the kingdoms of the earth are become the kingdoms of the Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever." Amen, and amen. (Notes, Rev. 11:15—18. 19:1—6.)

NOTES.

CHAP. XX. V. 1. Hezekiah reigned twenty-nine years, and he lived fifteen after this sickness: it must therefore have happened in the fourteenth,

2 Then [d] he turned his face to the wall, and prayed unto the LORD, saying, or beginning of the fifteenth year of his reign; about the time of Sennacherib's first invasion of Judea. (18:13.)—It is not likely, that all the events recorded in the two preceding chapters occurred within a part of one year; yet, this must have been the case, if Hezekiah's sickness was subsequent to the destruction of the Assyrian army. (Notes, 2 Chr. 32:24—26. Is. 38:6.)—The expression, "Set thine house in order," or, command concerning thine house, was a direction to Hezekiah, to make without delay, a full and final settlement of his domestic and civil concerns, that nothing might interrupt his mind, or take it off from the exercise of devotion, in the nearer approaches of death; and yet, that nothing might be neglected, which related to the interests of survivors. Hezekiah's disorder was in itself mortal, and must have terminated in death, without a miracle: the prophet therefore spoke according to the natural tendency of the disorder, and not according to the Lord's secret purposes. Hezekiah's prayer shewed, that he did not consider the sentence to be irreversible.

3 I beseech thee, O LORD, [e] remember now how [f] I have walked before thee [g] in truth, and with [h] a perfect heart, and have done that which is good in thy sight. And Hezekiah [i] wept * sore.

V. 2. It is probable that Hezekiah turned his face to the wall of his chamber, (which might be towards the temple,) merely that he might have more freedom and privacy, in pouring out his heart before God.

V. 3. Hezekiah evidently prayed, that he might recover, though he expressed himself with submission to the will of God: and doubtless he was very unwilling to die at that time. To account for this, it has been said, that believers under the Old Testament, having dark views of the eternal world, might be expected to die with more regret, than those under the New: but facts by no means support this supposition; for Abraham, Jacob, Aaron, Moses, Joshua, David, and others, seem to have left the world with as much joyfulness, as Paul himself. We must, therefore, ascribe Hezekiah's reluctance to die, either to the state of his mind, or to the circumstances of his family and the nation. Nothing appears peculiarly to have distressed him, in the view of immediate death, as to the state of his own soul. But the circumstances of his family, and the state of affairs in Israel seem to solve all the difficulty. Probably, at that time Hezekiah had no son; for Manasseh, who succeeded him, was not born till three years after. (21:1.) By his death, therefore, this branch of David's family would have been extinct, and the succession must have been continued in a more remote and obscure branch of it: and this would have been a discouraging rebuke to him, as if he had forfeited the covenant of royalty. It is a general and probable opinion, that the nation was at this time threatened with an assault by the whole force of the king of Assyria; they therefore needed a commander, who united wisdom, courage, and faith, to head them in such an emergency: and if he were removed, and they were left to a disputed succession, and the weakness of an usurped or opposed government, there could be little prospect, but that Jerusalem would share the fate of Samaria. With great earnestness and perseverance, Hezekiah had brought his reformation to a hopeful establishment: but he might fear, lest the instability of the people, and the dissensions of the nobles, would subvert all, if he were taken away at this crisis. He therefore desired to live, not for his own sake so much, as for that of his family and people, especially for the interests of true religion; and he prayed to that effect, with many tears, as well as with great fervency. (Notes, Is. 38:1—3,9—20.) The Lord knew, and Hezekiah could appeal to him, that he had walked before him in sincerity and uprightness of heart; having used all his authority and influence, with zeal and earnestness, to suppress idolatry and wickedness, and by every scriptural means to promote the worship and service of God; and that he had done what was good in his sight, being an example to his people. The consciousness of his integrity gave him confidence; and he begged the Lord to remember the fruits of grace which had been produced, and to spare him, that he might be yet more fruitful and useful. (Notes, 2 Chr. 30:23—27. 31:20,21. Neh. 13:14,31. 2 Cor. 1:12—14.)

V. 4, 5. Notes, 2 Sam. 7:1—5.—The captain (5) This title implies that Hezekiah was spared, that he might lead the people to victory, by the prevailing weapons of faith and prayer. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Josh. 5:13—15.)—I have heard, &c.] (Note, Is. 65:24,25.) The Lord knew his heart, and saw that he would be disposed, in the first place, after his recovery, to go up to his courts to return thanks for the mercy; and therefore he suited the message to his secret desires and intentions. (8) He should 'recover his strength so fast, 'as to be able in three days' time to go up to the 'temple, and give God thanks for his cure.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 6. Hezekiah was the only person, that we read of, who was previously informed how long he was to live. Such information would be of very bad tendency to ungodly men: and it would not be either comfortable or useful to a believer, unless animated with vigorous faith, and glowing zeal for the honor of God. Doubtless, this pious king made a good use of his knowledge, and waited the appointed period of his days with calm resignation; but we need not envy him this peculiar privilege. He was not more than fifty-four years old when he died.—God would also defend Jerusalem, as with a shield, against all the power and figs: and they took and laid it on the boil, and he recovered.

8 And Hezekiah said unto Isaiah, [u] What shall be the sign that the LORD will heal me, and that I shall go up into the house of the LORD the third day?

9 And Isaiah said, [x] This sign shalt thou have of the LORD, that the LORD will do the thing that he hath spoken: shall the shadow go forward ten degrees, or go back ten degrees?

10 And Hezekiah answered, [y] It is a light thing for the shadow to go down ten degrees: nay, but let the shadow return backward ten degrees.

11 And Isaiah the prophet [z] cried unto the LORD; and [a] he brought the shadow ten degrees backward, by which it had gone down in the * dial of Ahaz.

rage of the Assyrian king, for the glory of his own name, and for the sake of his servant David. (Notes, 19:34. Is. 38:6.)

V. 7. It seems that Hezekiah's sickness was a species of the plague, accompanied with a boil of fatal tendency: whether this application were medicinally proper, or not, doubtless it was rendered effectual by miracle; or rather, it was a token of the divine operation by which he was healed.

V. 8. As the Lord was graciously pleased frequently to confirm his promises by signs, Hezekiah desired one in this case; not in unbelief, but for the confirmation of his wavering faith. (Notes, Judg. 6:36—40. Is. 7:10—12.)

V. 9—11. The dial of Ahaz, it is probable, was placed full in Hezekiah's view, and the sun shining upon it: and he was allowed to choose, whether the shadow should go forward, or backward, ten degrees; that is, half hour lines, as it is conjectured. The progression of the shadow with accelerated speed, though evidently miraculous, seemed not so extraordinary to Hezekiah as its retrograde motion, which he preferred, and which accordingly took place. We are not concerned to determine, how God produced this effect: if he saw good, he was able to cause a temporary change in the motion of the earth and heavenly bodies: (Note, Josh. 10:12—14.) and some think that the same effect was produced in other places, especially at Babylon. (Notes, 2 Chr. 32:30—33, v. 31. Is. 38:8.)—It appears from Herodotus, that the Egyptians had observed some few instances, in which the course of the sun and moon was very different from what was usual; though their traditions of them were greatly distorted, and wholly unlike the real facts, as recorded in Scripture.

V. 12, 13. The king of Babylon seems at this time to have reigned independent; but he was in danger of being reduced under the power of the Assyrian monarch: yet, in process of time Babylon acquired the pre-eminence, and swallowed up the Assyrian empire. (Notes, 17,18. 17:24. 23:29,30. 2 Chr. 33:11. Is. 39:1.) This prince, having heard of Hezekiah's sickness, and the miraculous circumstances of his recovery, and knowing that he had refused submission to the Assyrians, seems to have proposed to enter into a confederacy with him against that potent nation, "and Hezekiah hearkened unto them," as inclined to accede to their proposals. He was too well pleased with this flattering embassy; and, in order to convince the ambassadors, who brought the letters, that he was a desirable ally, he shewed them all his treasures, and armor, and preparations for war of every kind. This resulted from pride and ostentation, and might have led to an improper alliance with an idolatrous prince. He seems likewise to have missed the opportunity of instructing the Chaldeans concerning the perfections of JEHOVAH, who had wrought the miracles which had excited their attention; and concerning his authority, law, and worship; and of shewing them the absurdity and evil of idolatry, especially their worship of the sun, which was evidently the creature and servant of the God of Israel. (Notes, 2 Chr. 32:24—26. Is. 39:2.)—Though Hezekiah's sickness preceded Sennacherib's invasion and overthrow, it is probable that this embassy arrived after that event; when Hezekiah's exhausted treasuries had been abundantly replenished by the spoil of the Assyrians. (Note, 2 Chr. 32:27—29.)

V. 14, 15. Hezekiah did not resent the prophet's interference in state-affairs; (Notes, 2 Chr. 16:7—10. 25:14—16.) for he reverenced his person, confided in his prudence and affection, and desired to hear the will of God from him. In his answer, he intimated, that he had counted it an honor to receive ambassadors from a far country. (Notes, Josh. 9:8—15.) Perhaps, he was not at first conscious of having done wrong; yet, in reviewing and relating his conduct, he was made deeply sensible of his sin and folly. (Note, 2 Chr. 32:30—33, v. 31.)

V. 17, 18. Considering the small and unsettled power of the king of Babylon, at this time, compared with that of the Assyrian kings, who seemed about to establish a permanent dominion over all the adjacent countries; nothing could be more unlikely, than the accomplishment of this prediction: yet in somewhat more than a hundred years it was exactly fulfilled!—All the remaining treasures and the vessels of the temple, and furniture made by Solomon, or supplied by subsequent kings, with all the treasures of the palace, and riches of the city, were carried to Babylon; and Daniel and his companions, some of whom were descended from Hezekiah, became eunuchs in the king of Babylon's palace. (Note, Dan. 1:3—7.)—Hezekiah dreaded the power of the Assyrians; but he was more disposed to expect help, than to fear ruin, from the king of Babylon. If this transaction occurred before Sennacherib's overthrow, as many suppose, (Note, 12, 13.) it took place previously to Hezekiah's emptying his treasuries, to hire Sennacherib's departure, on his first invasion of the land. (Note, 18: 14—16.) The chief reason for assigning this date to it is, that the power of the Assyrians, after the destruction of Sennacherib's army, ceased to be formidable; yet Hezekiah's conduct implied, that he chiefly feared danger from that quarter. But indeed, after that blow, the Assyrian power was far greater than that of any of the neighboring countries; and Hezekiah might desire to form a league to defend himself and his kingdom against it.

V. 19. Hezekiah humbly and submissively allowed the justice of the sentence, and the goodness of God in the respite; and gratefully acknowledged his unmerited kindness, in the peace, prosperity, and continuance of true religion in his days. Yet the prospect, respecting his family and nation, must have occasioned him many painful sensations. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

'In the midst of life we are in death:'—happy then are they, and they alone, who are habitually prepared for that event! Yet even to them, it is desirable to be apprised of its immediate approach: that they may settle all their temporal concerns, for the peace and benefit of their survivors; and then meet the separating stroke, with that calmness, and in that frame of spirit, which may most impress and edify surrounding friends.—If the Lord seem in his providence to command us "to set our house in order, for we must die, and not live;" and yet afterwards unexpectedly prolong our days; our preparation in that case will neither mar the comfort, nor lessen the usefulness, of our future lives.—It is frequently required of ministers, to intimate to sick persons the probability, or supposed certainty, of their approaching dissolution; as well as to assist them in improving the visitation, and in preparing for the event: and should such intimations afterward prove erroneous, they ought not to be censured for they can only speak according to their judgment, and deliver that message from God, which appears to them suited to the case of those whom they address.—Though miracles, properly so called, have ceased; yet the Lord hears the prayer of faith for the sick, and sometimes remarkably prospers simple means, used in dependence on his blessing. And though physicians, (for prophets are not now sent from God to inform us in these matters,) should give little encouragement respecting the recovery of beloved and useful persons; we may still continue to pray for them for, "with God all things are possible," and the most sagacious of men are often found mistaken. In respect of ourselves, it is generally best to be willing to depart, and to pray especially for spiritual blessings in behalf of ourselves and others. Yet there may be cases, in which men may with propriety be importunate for the continuance of life and health, in order to complete designs of public and allowed utility, which appear likely to be frustrated if they should be removed; or when in any way the important interests of families, churches, or nations appear to them connected with their lives. Yet, as we are all liable to mistake in these concerns, submission to the divine will ought invariably to be united with such petitions; and nothing else should make any man desirous to live in this wretched world, who knows that he is ready for a better.—The mercy of our God, and the merits of our heavenly Advocate form the sinner's never-failing plea at the throne of grace: yet, the consciousness of sincerity in our professed faith and piety, gives confidence in times of trial; and may, on some occasions, be pleaded before him, without the imputation of pride or self-righteousness.—Secret earnest prayer is the approved and successful method of obtaining relief and comfort, in seasons of the deepest distress: and sometimes the Lord immediately turns the mourning of the humble supplicant into joy and thanksgiving. He always hears the prayers and sees the tears of the broken in heart; and will give health, length of days, and temporal deliverances, as much, and as long, as they are truly beneficial.—The minister of Christ must deliver his Lord's message even when it contains alarms and rebukes; but he delights to be the messenger of joy and consolation, to those whom his word has previously wounded.—If we would have promised mercies, we must observe the instituted means; for these, being connected with the end by the express promises of God, are far more certainly efficacious, when used properly, than any of these means which produce their effect in the ordinary course of Providence: and yet, the latter ought not to be neglected, lest we tempt rather than trust the Lord.—Recovery from sickness should always be publicly acknowledged, by first "going up to the house of the LORD," to render the sacrifices of praise and thanksgiving, if it can be done: yet alas! few observe this rule, and many of those few do it as a formal task; while re-established health is employed in scenes of diversion or business, if not more directly devoted to the service of Satan by licentious pleasures. (Note, Luke 17:11—19.) But the true believer values the ability and opportunity of attending on the ordinances of God, and will go up with a glad and thankful heart; (Notes, Ps. 118:17—24.) and will value that, more than any other privilege of health.—True faith is not without its misgivings, so that the strongest believers desire to have theirs more strengthened: and in their experience, the Lord is pleased sometimes to give those evidences of his power, truth, and love to them, which establish their hearts as effectually as miraculous signs did of old. All creatures are his servants, to minister to the good of his children; and in answer to their prayers he can, in innumerable ways, render them subservient even to their spiritual benefit.

V. 12—21.

Alas! how seldom do we make suitable returns to the Lord for his condescending mercies to us! Ambition and ostentation too generally include, where thankfulness alone should occupy the heart; and we are often chargeable with pride, vanity, and carnal confidence, when we do not suspect ourselves.—It is very difficult to possess distinctions in rank, wealth, elegant furniture, or any thing valued by men, without a secret self-preference, and a desire that others should admire the possessor's ingenuity, taste, magnificence, or felicity. This foolish pride the Lord will rebuke and correct in those whom he loves; and especially when they idolize the opinion of ungodly men, and court their acquaintance, because they profess to esteem and admire them. But it is hopeful, when persons in superior rank will endure to be reasoned with, and reproved by those, who in outward circumstances are greatly their inferiors: for generally such interference, however well meant and prudently conducted, excites resentment.—If we could look into futurity, it would damp our joy in present prosperity: and we may expect vexation from every object, in proportion as we have been inordinately pleased with it.—Our regard to posterity, and our grief for the gloomy prospects before us, in the church or the world, must not render us unmindful of our present mercies, or induce impatient murmurs. Our God has wise and righteous reasons for all he does, or permits to be done; and if we enjoy peace, and the advantages of true religion in our days, we should be very thankful. Shortly, our trials and services will end together. Our space is limited, though its limits are unknown to us, and then we shall sleep with our fathers. And "blessed are the dead, which die in the Lord; ... for they rest from their labors, and their works do follow them!"

NOTES.

CHAP. XXI. V. 1, 2. It is uncertain whether Hezekiah had any other children than Manasseh, or any other wives than Hephzi-bah, whose name signifies, My delight is in her. (Is. 62:4.) Doubtless, Manasseh had been properly educated during the life-time of his father; and the rudiments of religious knowledge which he then imbibed, though they exceedingly aggravated the guilt of his enormous impiety, idolatry, and cruelty, might prove the seeds of his subsequent repentance: at least we may be sure, that his pious father offered many prayers for him, which at length were answered. (Notes, 2 Chr. 33:12—17.)—It would be pleasing to his youthful mind to inherit a prosperous kingdom so early in life; but this circumstance proved extremely prejudicial to him, and was still more ruinous to his people. (Notes and P. O. Luke 15:11—16.) The event, as well as the testimony of the prophets, evinces, that Hezekiah's reformation had been complied with in a reluctant and hypocritical manner, especially by many of the chief men; and that the nation was ripening fast for destruction. The nobles, upon whom the regency, or the counselling of the young king, must necessarily devolve, seem to have been disposed to idolatry: and by humoring and flattering Manasseh, they trained him to concur with their wishes, and probably to go much beyond them. (Notes, 2 Chr. 24:17,18. Matt. 23:15.) Soon after Hezekiah's death, his reformation was subverted; and the king proceeded from bad to worse, till he was carried captive to Babylon. Thus Hezekiah, though a prince of eminent piety and excellence, was the son of a very wicked father, and the father of a still more wicked son! (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. It is probable, that Manasseh was taught to consider his father's attachment to the temple, as the effect of a weak and bigotted mind. It appeared to the nobles more convenient, liberal, and magnificent, to have a variety of temples and altars; than to be confined to meet with the poorest of the people, from all parts of the land, at Solomon's temple. (Notes 1 Kings 12:26—29. 2 Chr. 24:17,18. Is. 29:13—16.) In contempt therefore of his father's memory, the king rebuilt the high places, which had been piously destroyed. (Notes, 18:4,22. 2 Chr

8 Neither [r] will I make the feet of Israel move any more out of the land which I gave their fathers; [s] only if they will observe to do according to all that I have commanded them, and according to all the law that my servant Moses commanded them.

31:1. Ec. 2:12—17.) Yet this seemed but a light thing, and he soon proceeded to copy Ahab's idolatry, and even greatly to exceed it. (Note, 1 Kings 16:30—33.)

V. 4, 5. In order, as it were, the more directly to insult the God of Israel, Manasseh built altars to his idols, and to the host of heaven, the sun, moon, and stars; (Note, Deut. 4:19.) not only in Jerusalem, where the Lord had recorded his name; but even in the courts of the temple itself; both that into which the priests and Levites and such as brought sacrifices entered, and that in which the other worshippers assembled. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 2 Chr. 33:6—8.)

V. 6. His son.] "His children." 2 Chr. 33: 6. Amon was not born till the thirty-third year of Manasseh's reign, which is generally computed to have been subsequent to his captivity and repentance. (1,19.) If so, some other son was thus dedicated to his idol, perhaps with some of his daughters likewise, of whom nothing is recorded. But it may be doubted whether Manasseh's captivity was so long before his death: the general character of his reign in Scripture, and the very imperfect reformation which afterwards took place, seem to render that opinion improbable; and there is no scriptural information concerning the date of his captivity, or even the name of the Assyrian king who carried him captive: so that perhaps Amon was the son here peculiarly intended. (Note, 2 Chr. 33:11.)

Observed times, &c.] (Notes, Ex. 22:18. Deut. 18:9—12.) The persons, who practised, or pretended to, these several methods of holding correspondence with invisible agents, or obtaining information from them, were Manasseh's oracles: and he inquired of them, instead of consulting the Lord by his prophets, or by the high priest. No doubt, they humored his vanity, and aimed to gratify his curiosity, without teaching him his duty, or reproving him for his sins. In this he went beyond all his predecessors. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1 Chr. 10:13,14. 2 Chr. 33:9,10.)

Of the grove. (7) האשרה. Perhaps this was a model of some grove, used for idolatrous worship though it is commonly supposed to have been the image of one of Manasseh's idols. (Note 17:16.) Some think that it was a wooden image of Ashteroth, or Astarte. (Note, Judg. 11—13.)—Manasseh seems to have placed this image in the temple itself. Thus he purposely affronted the Lord, and set him at defiance making the idol his rival, to intercept the adoration of his worshippers.

V. 9. Manasseh proposed one idolatry after another; and the people in general readily complied, both to obtain his favor, and because it suited their depraved inclinations. Thus they proceeded to such an excess of wickedness, that they became worse than the ancient Amorites or Canaanites, on whom Israel had inflicted the vengeance of heaven. (Notes, Lev. 18:24—3 Ez. 16:48—55.)

V. 10—12. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 9.) It is not certain, that any of the prophets, whose writings have come down to us, lived in the time of Manasseh. Isaiah and Hoshea probably were dead (Notes, 16. 19:2. Is. 1:1. Hos. 1:1.) Jeremiah did not begin to prophesy till several years after Manasseh's death. It is not known when Joel flourished. Nahum and Habakkuk seem to have lived at a later period. But a succession of prophets was raised up; and many, doubtless, addressed their contemporaries, whose writings and names have not reached us.—Tingle. (1 Note, 1 Sam. 3:11.

V. 13. As the builder keeps his work exactly straight and perpendicular, by the line and the plummet: so the Lord would execute strict justice upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem: proceeding by the same measure with them, as he had done with those of Samaria, whom he divided to the famine, to the sword, and to captivity; nay, he would be as severe with them, as he had been with the idolatrous family of Ahab. (1 Kings 21:21—24.) The subsequent expressive similitude emphatically represents the city subverted, and totally desolated; yet not finally destroyed, but cleansed from idolatry, and reserved for the future residence of the Jews. (Notes, Ez. 24:3—11.)

V. 14. Forsake, &c.] Not finally, but for a season, during the Babylonish captivity: yet this only related to the collective body of the nation, and their external privileges; for individual believers were preserved, and peculiarly noticed, even during that visitation. (Note, 1 Sam. 12: 22.)

V. 16. Probably, infants were burnt in the fire, by Manasseh's authority and command, to Molech; and the oppression, violence, and cruelty of his general administration might occasion much unrighteous shedding of blood: but his persecuting rage, against those who opposed and reproved his idolatries, seems especially intended. The Jewish writers assert, that he caused the venerable Isaiah to be sawn asunder, for warning him and his people of approaching vengeance: but this is of very questionable authority. It is not said that Isaiah prophesied in the days of Manasseh; nor is it probable that he did. (Note, Is. 1:1.)—His multiplied and varied murders, however, were an addition to his unprecedented idolatries, and indeed inseparably connected with them: for thus, as well as by seducing the people, (Note, 9.) "he made Judah to sin."

V. 17, 18. We shall hereafter meet with a more pleasing account of the latter part of Manasseh's reign. (Notes, 2 Chr. 33:11—19.)—He was not buried in the sepulchre of the kings, "but in the garden of Uzza," "in his own house," or some sepulchre which he had prepared there for himself. This seems to have been a penitent confession, that his crimes had rendered him unworthy to be numbered with the descendants of David. Some, however, suppose that the people would not allow him that honor. Yet, no doubt, he was a true penitent, though it is not here mentioned. (Note, 1 Kings 11:42,43.)

Of Uzza. (18) 'Some think this was the place 'where Uzziah was buried; (2 Chr. 26:23.) and 'that he chose to be buried here, as unworthy be-'cause of his manifold sins, (of which he repented,) 'to be laid in the common sepulchre of the kings 'of Judah.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 20—24. If Manasseh repented only in the latter years of his life, Amon was trained up in his youth, with the worst instructions, and was accustomed to copy the worst examples: and to these he adhered, without regarding his father's subsequent good behavior or advice. 'He was 'bred up in idolatry, and solemnly consecrated by 'his father to the service of Molech.' Bp. Patrick. If this were the case, Manasseh's captivity and repentance must have taken place at a later period, than is generally assigned it. (Notes, 6. 2 Chr. 33:11,21—25.) Amon's reign was very short, and he was soon cut off in his sins. Perhaps, his murderers meant to exclude the family of David, 25 Now [y] the rest of the acts of Amon which he did, are they not written in the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah?

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

Young persons are generally desirous of being their own masters, and of obtaining early possession of riches or power, that they may indulge their inclinations and self-importance: and too often, from such motives, are secretly rejoiced at the death of their parents. But this generally ruins the comfort of their future lives, and renders them the instruments of immense mischief to those, who are unhappily connected with them. It is much safer and happier, when youth is sheltered under the fostering care of affectionate and prudent parents, or of faithful guardians and tutors; till greater maturity of age and experience gives a more hopeful prospect of discretion. Though such young persons are less indulged, caressed, and flattered, and are laid under restrictions unpleasant at the time; they may live to be thankful for the restraints, under which at present they are impatient.—None are more abandoned than those, who become wicked after a religious education; for they cannot have quietness in vice, till by desperate courses they have effectually stupified their consciences: and in every case, the greater the obstacles which are surmounted, before men attain to the undisturbed indulgence of their lusts, the more lost they are afterwards to all sense of shame or decency. But the Lord will put his fear into the hearts of his true people, that they shall not finally depart from him: (Note, Jer. 32:38—41.) yet in the reformation of collective bodies, numbers are mere time-servers, such as "believe for a season, but in temptation fall away." (Note, Matt. 13:20,21.)—The mind of man is disposed to vibrate from one extreme to another; as the descending stone falls with a force proportioned to the height, to which it was raised: so that times of remarkable revival in religion have often been succeeded by those of most notorious infidelity, impiety, and profligacy.—The ambition of excelling prompts sinners to aspire after pre-eminence even in crimes; and men are capable of glorying in having gone beyond all their predecessors in iniquity, and in refining upon the blasphemy and sensuality of former times, or of contemporary rivals in vice!—An infidel neglect of true religion, is often connected with the most absurd credulity and ridiculous superstitions!—Some daring sinners not only seek to gratify their lusts, but seem desirous of forcing their crimes upon the notice of the Almighty; as if ambitious of provoking his indignation by every token of contempt and defiance! and they peculiarly delight in seducing others to commit the same wickedness, as if ambitious also of promoting the ruin of their souls!—The vain-glory of young persons often appears in affecting to be wiser than their prudent and pious parents, by reversing all their plans, and especially by treating with contempt their religious singularities, as they suppose them to be.—But these are the ways in which men expose their own folly and bring ruin upon themselves: thus they forfeit the Lord's favor and protection, and fall under his dreadful indignation: and all the mischief which they have done to others, will recoil upon themselves, to their increasing guilt and condemnation except a timely repentance prevent the fatal consequences.

V. 10—26.

If temporal judgments are so dreadful when foreseen or reported; what will be the horror of that day, when "the earth shall disclose her blood and shall no more cover her slain!" (Note, Is. 26:20,21.) Yet, in the severest vengeance, the Lord proceeds by rule and measure, and does not punish either nations or individuals beyond their deserts.—External privileges, instead of benefiting those who neglect the obedience of faith, will immensely enhance their guilt and punishment.—The Lord will cast off any professing people, who dishonor him by their crimes, and who persecute his servants: but he will never desert his cause on earth.—When sinners disregard the invitations and exhortations of God's ministers, they are constrained to denounce his awful vengeance. Then resentment will be awakened in the hearts of the proud and rebellious, and faith and patience will be peculiarly requisite: but the servants of the Lord will overcome all, "by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony."—It is inconceivable what wickedness some men have lived to commit, who yet have not only been spared, but pardoned: (Notes, Dan. 4:) such transgressors cannot forgive themselves, but would live and die covered with shame and self-abhorrence for all their crimes.—Whether the Lord bear long with presumptuous offenders, or whether he more speedily cut them off in their sins; all those who persist in forsaking him, and in refusing to walk in his ways, must perish: and the wickedness of the parent often occasions the destruction of the children. It is well, however, when the removal of the ungodly makes way for better characters: yet those who, instigated by any corrupt passion, execute deserved vengeance upon wicked men will bring deserved vengeance upon themselves also.

ust be understood to mean, at least, a majority f the elders and great men assembling, and, with ie approbation of the people, declaring to whom ie right of succeeding to the throne belonged. t may be supposed, that some of the nobles were oncerned in the conspiracy against Amon, or avored the cause. (Note, 21:20—24.) We may ierefore conclude that the persons, intrusted ith Josiah's education, were at least averse to dolatry, and favorable to the worship of JEHOVAH. erhaps his mother was a pious person, and inilled good principles into his tender mind. By ie blessing of God, however, on the means used, e was very early brought under religious impresons, and set about the work of public reformaon: and the event of his succession when a child as widely different from that of Manasseh. (Notes, 1:1—3.) For his character was most excellent: e copied the faith, zeal, and piety of his ancestor avid, and kept the middle path, without diverg-g to any of those extremes to which human naire is prone. (Notes, 18:3,5,6.) And had the eople as cordially concurred in his reformation, s he entered upon and persevered in it, blessed ffects would have followed: but they were given p to the most infatuated idolatry and wickedness, nd his efforts only served to evince the incurable ickedness of that generation. (Notes, Jer. 3:6 -11. 6:27—30. Ez. 24:12,13.)—We can obtain ut a superficial knowledge of the state of Judah om these compendious historical records, unless e compare them with the writings of the contemorary prophets.

V. 3—7. Josiah began to seek the Lord in the ghth year of his reign, and to attempt a public eformation in the twelfth; so that considerable ogress had before been made in destroying the ols, which filled Judah and Jerusalem to an alost inconceivable degree: but in his eighteenth ear he proceeded to reinstate the temple and its orship in their former splendor, and the princiil reformation in his reign was effected at this time. (Note, 2 Chr. 34:3—7.)—The money was collected by voluntary contributions, as in the time of Jehoash: but the Levites proved more active and faithful, than the priests had then been; and the workmen were no less worthy of confidence. (Notes, 12:4—15. 2 Chr. 34:8—13.)

V. 8—11. The inquiries and controversies, which this account of finding the book of the law has occasioned, seem to have been quite unnecessary. If it were conceded, that no other complete copy existed in all the world, at the time when this book was found, it would not in the smallest degree invalidate the authenticity of that part of holy writ: because all the succeeding writers of the Scriptures, with Christ himself and his apostles, have given the sanction of their testimony to its divine original. All the cavils and objections therefore of infidels, grounded upon this circumstance, mean nothing; except they are intended to demonstrate their imbittered enmity to the sacred Scriptures.—It is highly probable, that copies of the law were at that time very scarce, through the idolatry of the former reigns, and the lamentable ungodliness of the people. It may also be reasonably conjectured, that the priests had made abstracts from it, of the outlines of their worship, without specifying particulars, or inserting the solemn sanctions annexed to each of them. This would spare them the trouble of transcribing, or studying, or reading to the people, the whole book; and, as these abstracts would come into common use, few people would look any further. But had not a universal traditional recollection of the law, and in general of its contents, prevailed in the nation; how could the book, when found, have obtained proper and implicit credit as the word of God by Moses? In the dark ages of popery this was precisely the case: the liturgies and rituals contained a few selected portions of Scripture; and not only were the people kept in the dark as to the entire contents of the Bible, but few even of the priests phan, and [y] Achbor the son of [*] Michaiah, and Shaphan the scribe, and Asahiah a servant of the king's, saying, 13 Go ye, [z] inquire of the LORD for me, and for the people, and for all Judah concerning the words of this book that is found: for [a] great is the wrath of the LORD that is kindled against us, [b] because our fathers have not hearkened unto the words of this book, to do according unto all that which is written concerning us.

14 So Hilkiah the priest, and Ahikam, and Achbor, and Shaphan, and Asahiah, went unto Huldah [c] the prophetess, the wife of Shallum the son of [d] Tikvah, the son of Harhas, keeper of the [†] wardrobe (now she dwelt in Jerusalem in the [‡] college;) and they communed with her.

15 And she said unto them, [e] Thus saith the LORD God of Israel, Tell the man that sent you to me, 16 Thus saith the LORD, [f] Behold, I will bring evil upon this place, and upon the inhabitants thereof, even [g] all the words of the book which the king of Judah hath read.

had ever read it through, and numbers of these had never seen a complete copy of it. The same naturally becomes the case still, (notwithstanding the multiplication of copies of the Bible by the art of printing, and its public allowance in the vulgar tongue, and the commendable pains bestowed by pious persons to disperse them;) whenever any set of men become strenuous for one part of religion in preference to the rest. They, who are the oracles of each party, insert in their writings those portions of Scripture, which are supposed to inculcate the doctrines for which they contend; but keep out of sight, perhaps without design, those passages which as strongly declare, what they undervalue, overlook, or are prejudiced against. And these writings form the religion of the zealous friends of that party, while the rest of the Scripture is comparatively neglected or forgotten. Indeed we all are disposed to have favorite passages of Scripture, to which we are more attentive than to the rest; so that without great care we shall be led into this error. —And may it not be hinted with propriety, that some text-books, which were well designed, are yet capable of a dangerous abuse? I mean those books, which give a text of Scripture for every day, with pious observations upon it. Many read these in family-worship, instead of the Bible itself; and others, it is likely, do the same in their closets: but numbers are thus undesignedly led to substitute a part for the whole; the abstract with an exposition, instead of the book of the law: whereas "all Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." (Note, 2 Tim. 3:14—17.) The proper use of such books is to suggest subjects for pious meditations and ejaculations, in the intervals of conversation and business.—The book, which Hilkiah found, seems to have been the original book of the law, deposited by Moses at the side of the ark; (Note, Deut. 31:26.) but which in those distracted times had been removed, either for concealment, lest it should be destroyed by the idolaters, or in contempt by those who were turning every thing into confusion. Some argue that this circumstance occasioned Josiah's consternation: but he certainly acted like a man who had never seen the law before; and this most likely was the case, though there might be copies dispersed among his subjects. It is probable his reformation had hitherto been conducted by such abstracts, as have been mentioned, or by traditional knowledge. If the kings of Judah had observed the rule of transcribing the law with their own hands, very salutary effects might have been produced; but it seems to have been entirely neglected, as well as the command to read the law publicly to the people, every year at the feast of tabernacles. (Notes, Deut. 17:18. 31:9—13. Neh. 8:1—18. 9:3.)—It is supposed that the portion, which was first read to Josiah, was the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth chapters of Deuteronomy: and these were doubtless well suited to convince him, that the guilt and danger of his people was much greater than he had apprehended, and to induce the expressions of fear, sorrow, and humiliation, which he shewed. We may conclude, that he afterwards conducted his reformation with more exactness; as he now wrought by rule, and was aware of the imminent danger to which he and his subjects were exposed.

V. 12, 13. Very little is recorded concerning the high priests, as active instruments in reformation, and reviving true religion. Hilkiah indeed seems to have been a man of good character; though it is likely, not well acquainted with the divine law. (Marg. Ref.) Josiah, however, never proposed inquiring of the Lord, by him and the breast-plate of judgment; nor did Hilkiah object, when sent with others to inquire of a prophetess. Either he was ignorant, that to inquire of God was one distinguishing part of his office; or he humbly thought himself unworthy to perform it: or this method of inquiry was considered as obsolete; having fallen into disuse, perhaps, from the too general want of true piety in the high priests, who had been superseded in this respect by the prophets raised up in constant succession. (Note, 19:2.)—Ahikam. (12) Note, Jer. 26:24.

V. 14. Huldah, &c.] Jeremiah and Zephaniah prophesied at this time; but perhaps being young, and newly entered on their work, they were of inferior note; or they were elsewhere employed. (Notes, Jer. 1:1—3. Zeph. 1:1.)—The ordinary ministry, both under the Old and New Testament, is confined to men: but the Lord is not bound by those restrictions which he imposes upon us: and he has often conferred on women the spirit of prophecy. (Marg. Ref. c.—Notes, 1 Cor. 14:34,35. 1 Tim. 2:11—14.)—Huldah was doubtless a person of eminent piety, and well known to be a prophetess. She was a married woman, and her husband being keeper of the wardrobe, might make her better known to Josiah, who perhaps had before this consulted her.—Whether the word rendered "the college" means 19 Because [n] thine heart was tender and thou hast [o] humbled thyself before the LORD, when thou heardest what I spake against this place, and against the inhabitants thereof, that they should become [p] a desolation, and a curse, and hast rent thy clothes, and [q] wept before me; [r] I also have heard thee, saith the LORD.

20 Behold therefore, [s] I will gather thee unto thy fathers, and thou shalt be [t] gathered into thy grave in peace; and thine eyes shall not see all the evil which I will bring upon this place. And they brought the king word again.

an institution at Jerusalem, in some respects similar to the schools of the prophets in Israel; or whether it only denotes, according to the marginal reading, the part of the city in which she lived, is not agreed. The latter opinion, however, seems most probable, as the same word (הַמִּשְׁנֶה) is in the next chapter translated "of the second order." (Note, 23:4.)

V. 15—20. The sentence denounced concerning the desolations of Jerusalem was irrevocable: but as Josiah acted in a manner which shewed, that he was a man of a broken heart and a tender conscience, a true penitent and a real believer, he would be spared the anguish of witnessing those dire calamities. (Notes, 1 Kings 21: 27—29. Is. 57:15,16. 66:1,2. Jer. 36:20—25. Ez. 9:3,4.) Though he was slain in battle, yet he died in peace with God, and went to glory. As he was not forty years old when he died, and the total destruction of Jerusalem took place within twenty-three years after, he might have lived to that time, according to the ordinary course of nature. But as his piety and zeal could not avail to prevent that catastrophe, he was mercifully "taken away from the evil to come." (Marg. Ref.—Note, Is. 57:1,2.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—11.

Those who have been favored, in their tender years, with prudent and pious instructers, have very great cause for gratitude: for that circumstance is immediately ordered in Providence, without their even appearing to choose it for themselves, and frequently in opposition to their inclinations; yet it commonly proves the means of determining both the comfort and usefulness, and the happy close, of their future lives.—The Lord frequently demonstrates the sovereignty of his grace, by raising up the brightest ornaments of his church from the most degenerate families.—It is a peculiar favor to be brought to seek and serve God in early life, and to be led to copy closely the best examples.—It is incumbent on us to keep the narrow way, and to avoid the extremes, which are found on the right and on the left: and great watchfulness is requisite o to shun self-righteous pride, as to keep clear of antinomian abuse of the gospel. In escaping from superstition, we are in danger of running into inexpedient indulgence, or irreverence to things sacred. Fierce and contentious zeal, in some men, leads others to soothe themselves in lukewarmness, indolence, and timidity: and in numberless ways, when avoiding one evil, we are prone to run into another; or so to attend to one part of religion, as to neglect others, and thus to mar that proportion and symmetry, which are its peculiar ornament. But if, with all our circumspection, we are kept from great and mischievous mistakes; we must give all the praise to him, who leads his people "in the midst of the paths of judgment." (Prov. 8:20.)—The interests and passions of men raise up so many obstructions, that public reformations commonly move heavily; and can only be effected by perseverance, gradually, and as the zealous reformers obtain influence, and establish their characters by "patient continuance in well-doing."—Yet, in the worst of times, we meet with examples of liberality, fidelity, and integrity, which are worthy of praise and imitation.—The prevalence of impiety, infidelity, superstition, or licentiousness, renders the word of God a neglected book; and that neglect reciprocally augments these evils. And when professed ministers grow careless, selfish, or superstitious, the people of course become generally ignorant of the sacred oracles: and far more, when they employ their influence, and exert their authority, to keep the Scriptures, as translated into the language of their several countries, out of the hands of the common people; and to discountenance the study of them; and when they endeavor to obstruct those who would circulate, and encourage the study of, the oracles of God. Alas! that this stigma of popery should disgrace so many rulers and teachers of our protestant church! But whenever the clergy in general, and those of superior authority and reputation in particular, shall make it their great business, to call the attention of the people to the Scriptures, and to bring them acquainted with the whole of them; their conduct will have a most extensive effect, in preventing the influx of vice, and in promoting true knowledge and genuine piety. "For the word of God is quick and powerful;" and, being "sharper than any two-edged sword," it penetrates the heart and conscience with irresistible energy. (Notes, Jer. 23:28,29. Heb. 4:12,13.) By the holy law is the knowledge of sin, and by the blessed gospel is the knowledge of salvation. When the former is understood, in its strictness, extent, excellency, and awful sanction, the sinner perceives his guilt, is convinced that the great wrath of the Lord is kindled against him for his transgressions: and begins to inquire, "What must I do to be saved?"

CHAP. XXIII.

Josiah reads the law in a solemn assembly gathered for that and similar purposes, 1, 2. He enters into covenant with God; and abolishes idolatry in Judah, 3—14. He burns men's bones on the altar at Bethel; fulfils the prediction of the prophet sent to Jeroboam; destroys the high places in Samaria, and slays the priests, 15—20. He celebrates a solemn passover, 21—23. He puts away wizards, &c. 24: and excels all his predecessors, 25. The wrath of God against Judah is yet unappeased, 26—28. Josiah is slain in battle by Pharaoh-necho, and succeeded by Jehoahaz, 29, 30; who reigns wickedly three months, is led away prisoner by Pharaoh into Egypt, and succeeded by Jehoiakim, 31—34; who taxes the land for Pharaoh's tribute, and reigns wickedly, 35—37.

This excites his attentive regard to the ministry and ministers of the gospel; who point out to him "Jesus Christ, as the end of the law for righteousness, unto every one that believeth." And when the sinner has been taught to trust and love the Savior, he will thenceforth walk in newness of life.—The scarcity of the written word did not excuse Israel's degeneracy and idolatry, because it was the effect of it; "the people loved to have it so;" but the abundance of Bibles, with which this land is favored, will exceedingly aggravate the guilt of our national impiety, infidelity, and licentiousness: for what greater contempt of God can we shew, than to refuse to read his word, when put into our hands; or, reading it, to refuse to believe and obey it?

V. 12—20.

The ministers of religion must communicate to the people whatever they have learned respecting the will of God, whether alarming or encouraging: otherwise they do not "declare his whole counsel," nor "keep themselves pure from the blood of all men."—Kings and rulers, being personally as much concerned as their subjects to humble themselves before God, to know his will and to seek his salvation; and their conduct being of still greater importance to others; those who minister before them in sacred things, should especially instruct them in the whole of divine revelation: and they are guilty of the basest and most cruel unfaithfulness, to them and to millions, if from regard to their own safety or emolument, they keep back offensive truths.—Those princes who are acquainted with able and faithful servants of God, and who are not deterred by evil counsel from consulting them, and from encouraging them without needless ceremony to speak the whole truth, best consult their own good and that of their subjects.—It is also becoming, when superior stated pastors and rulers of the church discard prejudice and jealousy, respecting those among their inferiors, or of other orders in society, whom God endows with peculiar spiritual gifts for the edifying of his people; when, instead of standing upon character and precedency, and hindering others from regarding their advice, they take the lead in honoring the grace of God in them, and gladly receive their profitable instructions. Such are wise men, and will daily grow wiser; because they are conscious that they have not attained, but need continual accessions to their measure of divine knowledge and grace: but those who are too great or too proud to learn, even from their inferiors, are likely to live and to die without true wisdom.—In communicating his special blessings, the Lord does not restrict himself to age, or sex, or order, or condition in society; but "divideth severally to every one, as he will:" and true sanctity consists in separation from sin, and devotedness to God; and not in seclusion from society, or from that state which he has pronounced honorable.—There are kinds and degrees of guilt, which the Lord will not pardon, either in individuals or nations; and the discovery of men's iniquities will fully demonstrate the justice of his most tremendous vengeance on them. But a tender, broken, and contrite heart, a humble consciousness of having deserved wrath, and an earnest application for mercy, are things which "accompany salvation," and will never be rejected by our gracious Lord and Savior. (Note, Heb. 6:9,10.) Whatever persons of this character fear, suffer, or witness, or in what way soever they are removed out of the world, they shall be gathered to the grave in peace, and shall enter into the rest reserved for the people of God.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIII. V. 1, 2. Note, Deut. 31:10—13.—The prophets. (2) It may be supposed, that Jeremiah, Zephaniah, Huldah, and others were present on this occasion, encouraging and assisting the king in his pious undertaking: yet it is probable, that the king neither employed them, nor the priests, in reading the law to the elders of the people, at least not exclusively; but that he performed the service personally as the principal reader, though others might be employed in the same manner, in different stations; 'for it is not likely that one man's voice could 'reach so great a multitude.' Bp. Patrick. (Note, Acts 2:14—21.) The opinion, that he only engaged others to read the law, seems to be taken from modern refinements, and sentiments of royal dignity; and not from facts, good sense, or the examples of pious princes in those days. (Notes, 2 Sam. 6:12—22. 1 Kings 8:10—61. Ec. 1:1.) For such is human nature, that so trivial a circumstance, as the rank of the reader or speaker, will frequently excite greater attention, than matters of acknowledged superior importance.—Though Josiah was assured that no reformation could prevent the desolations of Jerusalem; yet he would do what he could to prolong her state, to rescue a remnant as brands out of the burning, and to sow good seed, which might afterwards produce a reformation even among the dispersed captives.

V. 3. (Marg. Ref.) The prophets, priests, and elders, and through them the whole nation by their representatives, bound themselves at this time, in the most solemn manner, to renounce and abolish every species of idolatry, to re-establish the worship of God according to the law, and to serve him in righteousness and true holiness. We learn from the event, that the most of those present, who "stood to the covenant," were hypocritical in the transaction; being induced to concur, in order to please the king, or to avoid his displeasure and the reproach of singularity; or by some transient impression upon their minds. Yet Josiah did well in requiring them thus to engage, as far as they could be prevailed on without compulsion. A great deal of outward wickedness would be prevented; many individuals would receive essential benefit; and in every way the name, worship, and law of God were honored: while those who acted hypocritically, and violated their engagements by apostacy, were accountable to God for their conduct. (Notes, 11:17—20. Deut. 29:10—15. Neh. 10:1.) Indeed, no effectual means can be used of doing extensive good, which will not eventually prove an occasion of deeper guilt and condemnation to many. V. 4. "The priests of the second order" seem to have been the heads of the several courses, which served in rotation, under the person next in succession to the high priesthood, who acted upon emergencies as deputy to the high priest. These were the chief priests mentioned so often in the New Testament. (Notes, 1 Chr. 24:1—19. Ezra 2:36—39.)—Josiah, in his former well-meant attempts for reformation, had probably removed the idols, and abolished the worship of them in Jerusalem: but perhaps, he had supposed, that the vessels and other valuables might be reserved for the use of the temple. Being, however, now more fully instructed in the law of God, he destroyed all these vessels, however costly, by fire: and in his progress through the land, he carried the ashes to Bethel, the beginning of idolatry to Israel, as established by public authority; in order to render both the place, and these ashes, contemptible and abominable to the people. (Notes, 1 Kings 12:26—33. 13:1—10.)

V. 5. Chemarim, the name of these priests, (marg.) is supposed to be derived from the black garments which they wore, and by which they were distinguished from the priests of JEHOVAH, who wore garments of white linen. (Notes, Ex. 28:40,41. Hos. 10:5,6. Zeph. 1:4.)

V. 6. Marg. Ref.—Note, Ex. 32:20.—The graves, &c.] The graves of the worshippers of these idols are meant. This was another expedient, to render these idols and the idolaters alike vile and abominable to the spectators.

V. 7. Note, 21:7,8, v. 7—Hangings, &c.] It is supposed that these hangings were intended for tents, in which the devotees of the demons perpetrated the most detestable species of lewdness, as a part of their religion, and as near as possible to the house of the Lord itself! This was even worse than making that holy place a den of thieves. (Notes, Ez. 8:7—14. Matt. 21: 12,13. P. O. 12—16.)

V. 8. It is probable that these high places were defiled, by casting the bones or dead bodies of men into them. Thus the people in general would be preserved from going thither, when they had so expressly been declared abominable; though presumptuous persons should rebuild them.—Josiah shewed his impartiality, when he destroyed those high places at the gates of the city, which seem to have been erected under the patronage of a considerable person, entitled "the governor of the city."

V. 9. It does not appear that these priests had been guilty of idolatry, but of irregularly and illegally worshipping JEHOVAH in the high places, instead of at the temple. To deter others from this inveterate practice, they were excluded from their sacred functions; but not put to death, or deprived of their maintenance, though it is uncertain what portions were allotted them. (Notes, Lev. 21:17—24. Ez. 44:10—16.)

V. 10. Notes, Lev. 18:21. 20:2—5.—Topheth, &c.] This place derived its name from a word, which signifies a drum: because they used to drown the cries of the children, who there passed through the fire, or were burned in it, by the sound of drums. (Notes, Is. 30:33. Jer. 7:32, 33.)

V. 11. The worshippers of the sun represented that luminary, by a man seated in a chariot drawn by swift and furious horses; and therefore they dedicated to him horses and chariots. The kings of Judah had imitated this custom, and kept the horses of the sun at the entrance of the temple: and a person, who, as it seems, was very honorably provided for, was employed to take care of them! But Josiah took away the horses and burned the chariots.

V. 12—14. Manasseh, after his repentance, had removed the altars from the courts of the Lord: but it is probable that Amon had replaced or rebuilt them, and they retained the name of their original deviser. (Notes, 2 Chr. 33:15—17, 21—25.) The high places which Solomon had built, had doubtless been in part at least demolished: but the idolatrous kings had rebuilt or repaired them, and dedicated them to the same idols, and called them by Solomon's name; perhaps glorying that they copied the example of so illustrious a prince. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 1 Kings 11:1—8.) The sacred writer seems to call the hill on which these high places were erected, and which is supposed to have been the mount of Olives, "the mount of corruption," because of the abominations there committed. All these, as well as the altars, which had been made on the flat roofs of their houses, for more retired idolatrous worship, Josiah cleared away entirely, and used every method of rendering the places, where idolatry had been committed, contemptible and vile.

V. 15—20. Josiah had evidently some authority over a great part of the country, which the ten tribes had occupied; (2 Chr. 34:6.) but it is not certain, whether this was by grant from the king of Assyria, or by the willing subjection of the inhabitants: the former, however, appears the more probable. (Note, 29,30.) On this occasion he exactly accomplished the prediction of the man of God concerning him, delivered about three hundred and sixty years before: and though he may be supposed to have designed that accomplishment; yet so wicked a man as his father could have had no such intentions, in giving his son the name of Josiah. (Notes, 1 Kings 13:2, 23—32.)—It seems that many Israelites had collected together in several parts of the land; and especially, that the idolatrous priests had resorted to Beth-el to renew their old idolatry. (Notes, 17:24—28.) These Josiah put to death, perhaps with others from the land of Judah who were notoriously guilty. By burning men's bones upon their altars he endeavored to render their idolatry detestable to all the inhabitants; that they might be induced to join themselves to the Jews in the worship of God at Jerusalem: for nothing was so polluting by the ceremonial law, as a dead human body, or any part of one. (Note, Num. 19:11.)—It has been justly observed, that if Josiah had entertained the same notions of the sanctity of relics, which have so long prevailed among professed Christians; he would have bestowed at least as much pains in honoring the bones of the old prophet from Judah, as he did in disgracing those of the idolatrous priests. But he thought it enough to let the bones of the man of God lie quietly in his grave.

V. 21—23. Having made all necessary preparation, Josiah proceeded to lead the attention of the people to their solemn feasts: and this first passover was celebrated with extraordinary zeal and exactness, and by immense multitudes; so that in all respects it exceeded every passover which had been observed from the days of Joshua. It must be supposed, that in the reigns of the idolatrous kings, this and the other sacred festivals were often entirely neglected: yet, under the judges, and during the reign of the pious kings, they were observed; but in no instance, with such regularity and zeal, and by so great numbers as at this time. (Notes, 2 Chr. 30: 35:)

V. 24. (Marg. Ref.) The whole narrative marks the care with which this pious prince had studied "the book of the law," after it was found; the diligent investigation which he made to detect and destroy every thing forbidden in it; and the exactness, as well as earnestness, with which his reformation was conducted. Had the princes and people been as sincere and zealous as their king, the happiest effects would have followed. (Notes, Jer. 3:6—11. Zeph. 1:5—8.)

V. 25. Hezekiah excelled all the kings of Judah for entire confidence in God; and Josiah surpassed all others in zeal for reformation, and in an unblemished life, being attentive to obey the precepts, and promote the glory of God, with his whole heart and soul. (Note, 18:5,6. 2 Chr 31:20,21.) 'Hezekiah himself was not so exact, 'and did not make such a thorough search as he 'did after all idolatrous practices.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 26, 27. Josiah lived above thirteen years after this great reformation, and to the end retained the people in the external worship of God: (2 Chr. 34:33.) but in general they relapsed secretly into many of their former idolatries and iniquities; and, as a collective body, they were not greatly amended in the sight of a heart-searching God.—They had heartily concurred in the idolatries and crimes of Manasseh, but they had not imitated his repentance: on the other hand they had hypocritically joined in Josiah's reformation, and were ripe, upon his removal, to join the apostacy of his sons. (Note, 25.) Manasseh's wickedness therefore was accounted national, and filled up their measure of iniquity; whereas Josiah's piety was personal, and the hypocrisy and apostacy of the people aggravated their guilt and hastened their ruin. (Notes, 21: 13—16. 22:15—20. 24:3,4.) But though the Lord did not turn from the fierceness of his great wrath, so as to spare Jerusalem from desolation, and the Jews from captivity; yet this event proved a kind of crisis in their disease: and while the wicked perished in vast numbers, the remnant was purified; and Josiah's reformation probably had a very happy effect, in raising up many persons to join this small remnant, which proved the precious seed of their future church and nation.

V. 29, 30. Nabopollazar, king of Babylon, assisted by the Medes, is supposed, before this time, to have conquered the Assyrians and destroyed Nineveh. Thus he became king of Assyria also: and some learned men are of opinion, that after Manasseh was freed from captivity, the kings of Judah reigned over the country formerly possessed by the ten tribes, as tributaries and allies to the kings of Babylon.—Josiah might therefore consider himself as under engagements to the king of Assyria, as well as unwilling that the contending parties should march their armies through his country: he however lost his life in the attempt. Megiddo was situated in the lot of Manasseh, in a northern part of the land: (Judg. 1:27.) but at this time it seems to have been under Josiah's government. Perhaps Josiah disguised himself, that the king of Egypt might not know him; but he, having discovered him, singled him out for slaughter. When he had received his mortal wound, he was carried out of the battle, and he died by the way to Jerusalem. (Note, 2 Chr. 35:20—24.)—It has commonly been observed that our young king Edward VI. greatly resembled Josiah. He gave indeed singular evidence of wisdom and piety far beyond his years: but he was taken away at the age, when Josiah first began to seek the Lord; and we can only conjecture what he would have been and done, if he had been spared to reach the age at which Josiah was slain.—The people of the land placed Jehoahaz, or Shallum, the second son of Josiah on the throne in preference to his elder brother Jehoiakim: (Note, 22:1,2.) probably, because he was deemed to be of a more active and martial temper. And to confirm their irregular proceedings, they anointed him, as if he had been immediately appointed by God: (Note, 1 Kings 1:38, 39, v. 39.) but alas! the season of the Lord's graciously giving them pious kings to reign over them was elapsed, and all Josiah's sons proved wicked, impolitic. and unsuccessful. As Zedekiah was no more than twenty-one years old, when he was made king, after Jehoiakim had reigned eleven years, and Jeconiah his son a short time; (24:18.) he of course was younger than Jehoahaz, though mentioned before him in Chronicles. (1 Chr. 3:15.)

Josiah went against him. Patrick.* —Pharaoh-necho: ... Megiddo.] 'Whom Hero-'dotus ... calls Νεκως,' (Necos) 'and mentions the 'fight which he had with the Syrians εν Μαγδολω' (Magdolum.) Bp. Patrick.

V. 33. Jehoahaz had assumed the regal authority without Pharaoh's consent, and perhaps attempted to continue the war against him; which appears probable, because he was bound at Riblah, at the northern extremity of the promised land. Pharaoh, by some means, took him prisoner, deposed him, and sent him bound into Egypt, where he ended his days: (Notes, Jer. 22:10—12. Ez. 19:2—9.) and the land was put under tribute, in token of its subjection to the king of Egypt. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 34. "Jehoiakim" means the same as "Eliakim;" except that the latter is compounded with the word translated GOD, the former with a part of the name JEHOVAH. Pharaoh seems not to have wished Jehoiakim to renounce his religion; but chose to distinguish him, as the ruler of that people, who professed to worship JEHOVAH.—Hitherto the kingdom of Judah had descended in a direct line from father to son: and this is the first instance of one brother succeeding another. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

Nothing ought to discourage our endeavors to promote a revival of true religion. If declining churches and nations cannot be rescued from impending judgments, a few individuals may be snatched as "brands from the burning:" and if ministers, in their several stations, fail of general or abiding usefulness, and have continually the prospect of being removed; many a one may, in the mean time, receive important benefit, and prove the seed of a future revival, even in that very place.—As sinners cannot be preserved from eternal destruction, without repentance; so, degenerate nations cannot be rescued from public calamities, without general reformation. To effect this it is the interest of princes to promote the knowledge of God in their dominions: and it is no degradation of their dignity, personally to take an active part in such attempts; which will induce numbers of every order in the community to concur.—All external obligations to the service of God may be entered into with a hypocritical, or self-righteous spirit: yet this should not make us object to such engagements ourselves, or averse to propose them; but only make us cautious in what manner we do it, and careful to inculcate the same caution upon others. It is safe to bind ourselves solemnly to walk after the Lord, and to keep his commandments; because these are previous indispensable duties, (Note, Num. 30:2.) and some are thus rendered more earnest in attending to them: but the word of God must be the rule and standard in every thing; not only as to the duty itself, but also as to the motive and manner of doing it.—In those nations, which profess to worship God, and which are favored with the light of revelation, we need only to investigate with diligence, and compare the result of our observations with the word of truth, to discover such enormous and multiplied abominations, as could never have been conceived upon a distant and superficial view, or a judgment formed by other rules. Even in worshipping congregations, an exact scrutiny would commonly bring to light such evils, as before were never suspected: but the most humiliating discoveries will be made, by an exact inquiry into our own hearts and conduct. That man, who previously deemed his behavior unexceptionable and his heart good, if he can be engaged in diligent self-examination and watchfulness, daily beholding himself in the mirror of God's word, and for a long time comparing with it his thoughts, intentions, dispositions, words, and actions; will experience increasing convictions of the deceitfulness and desperate wickedness of his heart, and of the exceeding sinfulness of his whole life. And if he set about amendment, in dependence on the mercy and grace of God in Jesus Christ, and according to the rule of the Bible, he will, as he proceeds, find still more and more to be done; and to the end of his life perceive, that he is very far off from the perfect righteousness of the holy law. Nor are any persons disposed to object to this unfavorable statement, but such as are either unacquainted with the rule, or strangers to a serious examination of their conduct by it. (Note, Jer. 17:9,10. P. O. Ez. 8: Notes, Rom. 7:7—12. Jam. 1:22—25.)—Imperfection is stamped upon all human goodness, and the greatest reformations hitherto seen on earth, have left many things unreformed.—The scriptural history may well excite the hatred and disgust of the proud admirers of the human heart and understanding; as it presents to our view a very mortifying picture of the blindness of man's mind, as well as of the perverseness of his will, and the depravity of his affections. But, suppose the appeal made to other histories, or to universal observation and experience:—if the records of Greece and Rome were presented to our view, as a detail of facts, without the varnish of declamation and panegyric; if the conduct of these celebrated nations, in public and private life, throughout their term of notoriety, were impartially compared with the just and holy law of God; would not their idolatries and immoralities be found to exceed even those of Israel? (Note, Rom. 1:28—32.) Would they not picture human nature as blind and depraved as the Bible does? And do not all the encomiums bestowed on them, arise from man's disposition to "call good evil, and evil good, to put darkness for light, and light for darkness?" (Note, Is. 5:20.) Pride, ambition, rapacity, cruelty, and revenge, have even been canonized by poets, and orators, and historians: and idolatry, impiety, brutal excess, and unnatural lusts have been called by soft names, and excused, if not vindicated, by these elegant and ingenious ancients. Otherwise the conclusion is as irrefragable from the study of profane history, as from the records of God's word, that "the imagination of man's heart is only evil from his youth:" and that all the real godliness, or goodness, which has ever been found on earth, has been derived from the new creating Spirit of Jesus Christ.—Persons of eminence, of whatever kind, have need to be very careful what they sanction: for numbers, in distant ages and nations, may be emboldened to transgress, by acceding to their sentiments, or by imitating their examples: and the reflection, of doing extensive mischief for generations to come, would, in that case, be a painful prerogative of superior talents, rank, or reputation.—In using all our influence decidedly to suppress abuses, and to oppose iniquity, we should shew all allowable tenderness to the persons of men: yet man must not pretend to more mercy than his Maker, by sparing those whom he orders to be punished.—In reducing our conduct, or that of others, to the standard of Scripture, in evident and important matters, no allowance must be made for customary, reputable, ancient, or fashionable abuses: difficulties also must be encountered, hardships endured, self-denial exercised, and opposition and every worldly interest disregarded: no man must be known after the flesh; nor any attention paid to persuasions, complaints, remonstrances, or reproaches; nor even to prejudices, except in matters of subordinate consequence. Therefore courage, constancy, and patience, are requisite for such attempts; and these, when genuine, can only spring from grace and faith, and be given in answer to prayer, without which every undertaking of this kind will be fruitless.—Not only should gross abominations be precluded; but every temptation or occasion of sin should be removed, whatever be the secular loss or expense, if we would effectually glorify God, and do good: and every method should be adopted to fill men's minds with abhorrence of iniquity, and to shew plausible abuses in a contemptible and detestable light: especially where godly people are liable to be seduced into pernicious compliances.

of the event may seem to expire; but they will all be punctually fulfilled in their season: and it must give singular encouragement to the pious, when they find themselves evidently employed in bringing about that accomplishment.—Ungodly persons may, even after death, be more respected for their connexion with the servants of God; but the Judge of all will not regard such distinctions.—When gross iniquities are renounced, and a credible profession of faith, repentance, and devotedness to God are made, men may be deemed prepared for the most solemn ordinances of his worship: though no human care or penetration can exclude formal hypocrites; such attendance on the worship of God is externally honorable to him, and useful to numbers: and, as he will know how at last to separate between the tares and the wheat, we must leave them to grow together till the harvest. The scrutinizing eye of the zealous servant of God will continually find many abuses to be rectified; and we must still press forward, both in personal and public reformation. Those who attempt this with their whole heart, in humility and simplicity, may hope to be useful to others, and shall certainly be accepted themselves; and as there are degrees of excellency among true believers, so they will receive a proportionable recompense. But when the sins of a collective body are come to a crisis, no human endeavors can avert the wrath of God: and when eminent and useful persons are prematurely taken away, it forebodes public calamities. (Note, Is. 57:1,2.) The best of men may be misled into unadvised meddling with matters not properly belonging to them: but if we are habitually living by faith, and walking with God, even should we be taken away in consequence of any indiscretion, it will not prevent our dying in peace, and being received to glory.—Piety is personal, the effect of special grace. The children even of the most pious parents inherit original depravity; nor can education, instruction, or example prevent its effects, without regeneration: yet abundant encouragement is given to the diligent use of the appointed means of grace, in respect of our children. (Notes, Gen. 18:17—19. Prov. 22:6.)—When those who have stood in the gap are removed, judgments often follow like an inundation: and a little time and slender abilities frequently suffice to undo all the external good, which pious men, of excellent capacities, have been laboring, with unremitting endeavors, for a course of years to effect. (Notes, Ec. 2:18—23. 9:13—18.) Blessed be God, that good work, which he begins by his regenerating Spirit, cannot be disannulled: but, notwithstanding all changes and temptations, shall be "performed unto the day of Jesus Christ."

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIV. V. 1. Pharaoh-nechoh, after Josiah's death, obtained a victory over the king of Babylon, and for some time retained Judea and Syria in subjection. But not long after, Nabopollazar seems to have associated his son Nebuchadnezzar with him in the kingdom, that by him the war with the Egyptians might be conducted with greater vigor. For when Daniel had been three years under tuition at Babylon, and had afterwards been introduced to Nebuchadnezzar, he interpreted the dream of that prince in the second year of his reign: yet Daniel had been carried captive by Nebuchadnezzar the king. (Note, Dan. 2:1.) Two distinct dates respecting the beginning of his reign must therefore be admitted; and it appears that he was made king two or three years before his father died.—Nebuchadnezzar having obtained decisive advantages against the Egyptians, attacked Jehoiakim, as an ally of Nechoh, and, having taken him prisoner, he "bound him in fetters to carry him to Babylon;" (2 Chr. 36:6,7.) but upon his submission he released him, and carried away some of the gold and silver vessels of the temple, and some of the most considerable persons of the land. Among the latter were Daniel and his companions. (Notes, Dan. 1:1—7.) This is the first epoch of the seventy years of the Babylonish captivity. Nebuchadnezzar left Babylon in the third year of Jehoiakim, and he reduced that prince in his fourth year. After this, Jehoiakim served the king of Babylon three years, and in his eighth year he rebelled against him, about three years before his death. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. It may be supposed, that these nations had been subjected to the king of Babylon; and were encouraged by him to attack the revolted Jews, while he was otherwise employed. But the Lord's secret disposal of their hearts to these attempts alone is noticed. It is probable that Jehoiakim was harassed by them during the remainder of his days; and perhaps he was at last slain in some sally against them, when they approached Jerusalem; and so left unburied, or otherwise very disgracefully treated. But some think, that after the transactions here recorded, Nebuchadnezzar carried him to Babylon, and at length put him to death, and treated his dead body most ignominiously. (Note, Jer. 22:13—19. 36:30,31.)

V. 3, 4. Manasseh's idolatry became a national sin, as publicly enforced by persecution, which filled Jerusalem with the innocent blood of those who refused compliance. The chief men of Judah were involved in this guilt, and had neither repented, nor been brought to justice for it: thus, accumulated and atrocious

The king of Egypt having been driven back into his own land, and confined there; the kings of Judah were left entirely at the mercy of Nebuchadnezzar: so that policy, as well as their most solemn engagements, demanded their peaceable submission, and their resignation to the correcting hand of God in that dispensation. (Notes, Ez. 17:2—21.)

V. 8—16. Jehoiachin, or Jeconiah, seems to have mounted the throne on the death of his father, without waiting for the king of Babylon's consent: but it was like going on board a sinking ship. He had just time enough to manifest his evil disposition, and was then attacked by the king of Babylon: who, probably, was provoked by his thus assuming the authority, and suspected him of designing to revolt: so that Nebuchadnezzar besieged Jerusalem, first by his captains, and then personally. And either by surrender, or upon some deceitful engagement, Jeconiah went forth to him, and was carried captive to Babylon. After all the depredations, to which the temple had been exposed, some of the vessels that Solomon had made, remained in the treasuries of the temple: but all, except what were in immediate use, seem at this time to have been seized, and some of them cut in pieces, and sent to Babylon. And those, afterwards mentioned, might be such as had been before this carried away, or such as were found at the complete destruction of the temple and city. (25:14,15. Ezra 1:7—11. Jer. 28:3,6. Dan. 5:1—4.) It is no where said, what became of the ark of the covenant and the mercy-seat: but in some way these were destroyed; for all allow, that there was no ark in the temple built after the captivity; and it is not improbable, that at this time the gold of the ark, &c. was cut off, and taken away. This event took place in the eighth year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, (12) and forms a second epoch to be regarded in computing the duration of the captivity. (Notes, 2 Chr. 36:21. Ezra 1:1—4. Dan. 1:1,2.)—The chief and the most useful of the people were carried to Babylon, that the land might be reduced to absolute dependence on Nebuchadnezzar. Seven thousand soldiers, one thousand craftsmen and smiths, and two thousand persons of superior rank, may make up the sum total ten thousand. Some learned men, however, suppose, that there were ten thousand carried captive from Jerusalem alone, besides a thousand craftsmen and smiths; and also seven thousand from the rest of the land.—Jeremiah speaks of three thousand and twenty-three, who seem to have been carried away the year before, out of the open country. (Note, Jer. 52:24—30.) Among the rest Ezekiel was at this time made a captive. (Note, Ez. 1:1—3.)

V. 17. Jehoiachin was succeeded by his uncle, the youngest son of Josiah.—"Mattaniah" signifies the gift of JEHOVAH: "Zedekiah," the righteousness of JEHOVAH: and the king of Babylon, by giving him this name, meant either an appeal to the justice of God against him, if he violated his engagements; or to refer to the judgments, which he had heard were denounced against Jerusalem by a righteous God.

V. 20. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

When the Lord leaves men to the blindness of their own minds, and to the lusts of their own hearts; some are infatuated to adopt and obstinately persist in the most destructive measures; and others are hurried on by ambition, avarice, or resentment, to execute upon them the vengeance which had been predicted.—Multiplied murders, sanctioned by authority, and persevered in with impunity, form a species of national wickedness which the Lord will not pardon; especially when false religion is established by law, and persecuting statutes are enacted or revived, and executed against his true worshippers: and when this is not merely the act of a few oppressors, but the people in general "love to have it so." Yet, even this may be endured by the long-suffering of the Lord for many generations; till the whole accumulated load falls upon a devoted people, with direful destruction.—Blessed be God, there is no degree or kind of personal guilt, which he will not pardon to the true penitent; for it is "impossible to renew unto repentance" such as have committed "the sin unto death." (Notes, Heb. 6:4—6. 1 John 5: 14—18.) But it is very distressing for those, who have obtained forgiveness of their own transgressions, to reflect that they have been the guilty occasions to others, by their examples, influence, or persuasions, of those sins, which, being continued in, the Lord will not pardon; and of which they have no power to bring them to repent. The good Lord preserve us from sin and temptation, and above all from being tempters to others! And may this reflection stir up young persons to seek and serve God without delay, lest they should do that mischief, which, if they themselves should live to repent, they will never be able to undo.—When God arises to judgment, all resistance will be ineffectual; and the folly, as well as the wickedness, of every worldly dependence, will be manifest: but his justice will never appear in its full glory, till that day, when "he will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts." (Note, 1 Cor. 4:3—5.) In the mean time, we are incompetent judges of the divine procedures; and ought to wait with silent patience.—Wicked men soon discover the temper of their hearts, and give evidence of what they would do if they were spared: therefore the Lord often cuts them off, to prevent further mischief; and thus hinders them from "treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath." But when their power is taken away, and their lives are spared, though in poverty and misery, it may be an infinite mercy to their souls. (Notes, 25:27—30. Jer. 24:4—7.)

V. 8—20.

The gradual approach of divine judgments affords sinners space for repentance, and believers leisure to prepare for properly meeting the calamity: but it only evinces the desperate obduracy and obstinacy of those, who are not deterred from their sins by all which they witness or experience.—God delights in his ordinances, so long as they prove means of grace to those who are favored with them; but he abhors them, when they degenerate into a lifeless form: and that, which to the carnal eye appears most glorious in religious worship, is often in his account a vile abomination.—Wicked men become curses to each other; and the nearer their intimacy or relation, the greater will be the anguish of those who sin and perish together.—External pre-eminence, in times of public calamity, often gives the precedency in suffering; but riches, dignity, authority, and superior abilities, will assuredly increase the sinner's condemnation; for to whom much is given, of him will the more be required. Let us then neither envy nor covet such precarious advantages, but be warned to improve every talent intrusted to us. Let us in these awful events contemplate the truth of the scripture, and "flee from the wrath to come;" embrace and plead the precious promises of God; and by patient continu

NOTES.

CHAP. XXV. V. 1—5. Jerusalem was so fortified by nature and art, that notwithstanding the enfeebled state of the inhabitants, and Nebuchadnezzar's great power and military skill, it could not be taken till the besieged were incapacitated by famine to make any further resistance. (Notes, Lam. 4:10,12.) In the Prophecy and Lamentations of Jeremiah, we shall have an opportunity of more fully considering the circumstances of this catastrophe, and indeed the whole of this compendious history: it suffices in this place to observe, that the obstinacy, impiety, and misery of the besieged were alike great, and almost unparalleled. (Notes, Jer. 37: 38: 39:1—10.)—The king and his remaining forces endeavored to escape by some private gate, which the enemy had not observed, or did not guard: but his attendants were dispersed, and he was taken prisoner. (Notes, Lam. 4:20. Ez. 12:1—16.)

V. 6, 7. Nebuchadnezzar, having placed Zedekiah on the throne, and made him engage to be faithful to him, tried and condemned him as a traitor, in the presence of his ministers and counsellors: (Notes, 2 Chr. 36:13. Jer. 39:1—10. Ez. 17:15—21. 21:25—27.) and, having slain his sons in his sight, as the last spectacle which he should ever behold, and which might ever after haunt his affrighted imagination, he put out his eyes, and sent him in chains to Babylon. (Notes, Jer. 32:4, 5, v. 5. 34:1—5. 38:1—6,20—23. Ez. 12:8—16.) Here he ended his life, probably not long after; for no more is recorded concerning him. Zedekiah left daughters at Jerusalem, who went down with Johanan to Egypt, and doubtless died there. (Jer. 41:10. 43:6.)

V. 8—10. Nebuzar-adan seems to have arrived at Jerusalem on the seventh day of the month, but he began to execute his commission on the tenth. (Jer. 52:12.)—The king of Babylon, enraged at the long and obstinate defence, which the Jews had made, determined that this city should be no more inhabited, to cause him or his successors so much trouble and expense in future. (Notes, Ezra 4:12—24.) He therefore gave orders to level the city with the ground, without sparing even the temple, either for its sanctity, antiquity, or magnificence! Thus he performed the words both of the later prophets, and likewise the predictions of Moses. This is computed to have been four hundred and twenty-four years, from the time when Solomon laid the foundations of the temple. Josephus informs us, that the second temple was destroyed by the Romans, on the same day of the same month.

V. 13—17. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1 Kings 7:13—51. Jer. 52:17—23.) By this it appears, that Nebuchadnezzar did not purpose wholly to desolate the land; but by destroying Jerusalem to deprive the nation of the power of resistance, and so to continue in it a feeble company of men to cultivate the earth.—But his design, in this respect, was defeated, that the purpose and predictions of God might be accomplished. It is not known what became of the ark; but it was not afterwards found. (Notes, 24:6—16. Ezra 1:7—11. Hag. 2:6—9.)

Without weight. (16) The quantity of brass was so great, that its weight was not ascertained. (1 Kings 7:47.)

V. 18—21. Marg. Ref.—Five. (19) Seven men are mentioned by Jeremiah; (Note, Jer. 52:24—27.) but perhaps five were of superior rank to the others; or were more distinguished as the favorites and counsellors of Zedekiah. All these persons were put to death as accessaries to his rebellion.

V. 22—26. Nebuchadnezzar intended to preserve some inhabitants in the land; but it was the Lord's purpose that it should be desolated. (12. Notes, Jer. 25:8—10.)—Ishmael, being of the royal family, could not endure to see any shadow of authority possessed by another, while he was excluded; and therefore he murdered Gedaliah, who seems to have been a wise and good man. His father Ahikam had been Jeremiah's protector; and the prophet had by choice joined his company. (Notes, Jer. 26:24. 40:6.)—After this event, the Jews, rejecting the word of the Lord by Jeremiah, fled into Egypt, for fear of the resentment of the king of Babylon; and there they either miserably perished, or were lost among the natives, and thus God performed his purpose and predictions of desolating the country, contrary to the intentions of the instruments, which he had hitherto employed. (Notes, Jer. 39:—42:) The small numbers, mentioned in all the accounts of these events, lead the mind to a most melancholy reflection on the multitudes who must have perished, and been driven into other lands, by the distresses of the Jews, previous to this catastrophe.

V. 27—30. It is recorded that Nebuchadnezzar, after his recovery from the miraculous insanity with which he had been visited, committed his son to prison for mal-administration during that period; (Notes, Dan. 4:28—37.) and that there he contracted an acquaintance with Jehoiachin. God had foretold, that the captives at Babylon would be more favored, than those who remained at Jerusalem: and thus Jehoiachin was at length more favored than Zedekiah. (Notes, Jer. 24:)—Many captive or tributary kings abode at Babylon, but Jehoiachin was treated with greater kindness and respect than any of them, either out of personal affection, or from regard to the ancient race of the kings of Judah. (Note, Jer. 52:31.)—As Evil-merodach reigned but two years, it is probable Jehoiachin did not live long after this. (Note, Ezra 1:1—4.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—21.

If repeated warnings and afflictions leave the sinner's heart more obdurate than before, it is an evidence that his ruin is at hand. (Note, Prov. 29:1.)—Those advantages, which inspire confidence in the ways of wickedness, will eventually aggravate the possessor's misery: for no power can resist, no craftiness can elude, those whom God appoints to be the executioners of his vengeance.—If rebellion against earthly princes deserve penalties so severe, as by common consent have, in all ages and nations, been inflicted upon those who were guilty of that crime: who can estimate what or how much punishment is due to rebellion against our Creator, Benefactor, and Sovereign!—Precious as our eyes are to us, they may possibly be reserved to witness such scenes, as may make us wish, that they had been previously closed, in darkness or in death. But surely no sight can be so distressing, as the misery of our children, when occasioned by our own misconduct!—God over-rules, and imperceptibly guides, even the anger and the resentment of men to execute his righteous purposes for his own glory. In the day of his indignation, he utterly disregards populous cities, magnificent palaces, and fertile countries: nay, he permits his avowed enemies to destroy his sanctuaries, to prevent the administration of his ordinances, and even to extinguish the very light of his gospel, in those places, where these inestimable advantages have long been despised, neglected, or perverted. But he will still preserve his true religion, though perhaps among the poor and despised alone.—As the Lord "spared not the angels, that sinned;" as he has doomed the whole race of fallen men to the grave, and all unbelievers to hell; and as "he spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all;" we need not wonder at any desolation or miseries which, for sin, he may see good to bring upon guilty nations and churches.

V. 22—30.

The secret working of Providence disappoints the politic or humane purposes, of such as purpose to spare those whom God intends to destroy: and, while some are left to their ungoverned passions, and others to their groundless fears and infatuated devices, "his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure."—No state of misery on earth can be called absolutely hopeless or comfortless. In hell alone this blackness of darkness is to be found for ever. During our most dismal and tedious nights of adversity, we may hope for the cheerful dawning of prosperous days; especially, if our afflictions lead us to repentance: for God has all hearts in his hands, and, as he sees good, can incline them to kindness.—The believer in this world is, as it were, imprisoned with sins, temptations, and tribulations, sometimes for many a tedious year: but death, as the servant of Jesus Christ, comes for his enlargement. Then, the prison-door is opened, his fetters are loosed, his prison-garments changed for the robes of salvation and glory; his head is lifted up, and his throne advanced above the chief of the kings of the earth; and he shall be eternally feasted upon the fulness of joy, which is to be found in the presence and favor of the Almighty. Indeed, even here, the Savior grants to the trembling, distressed, and enslaved sinner, who comes and trusts in him, a blessed release from condemnation and bondage: he bestows on him liberty, change of raiment, royal immunities, and heavenly provisions, day by day; and these are intended as earnests and foretastes of those "pleasures, which are at his right hand for evermore." In short, sin alone can hurt us, and Jesus alone can do good to sinners. May God help us to believe; and to wait, in patient hope, for the blessed season, when, being made more than conquerors by his grace, we shall "sit down with the Savior upon his throne, even as he hath overcome, and hath sat down with the Father upon his throne!"

THE FIRST BOOK

CHRONICLES.

IT is generally agreed, that the books of the Chronicles were compiled by Ezra, after the Babylonish captivity; and that they consist of extracts from the public records of the Jews, and the writings of preceding prophets. Some passages appear to have been inserted in the very words of the original record, which was written before the captivity; and a few names seem to have been added to the genealogies, after the death of Ezra. (1 Chr. 3:19—24.) The original name is (דִּבְרֵי הַיָּמִים) The words of the days, which signifies Journals, or Annals; and it is not improperly rendered Chronicles, or Records of the times. Anciently, the whole formed but one book in the Hebrew Bible; but the Septuagint divide it into two, and call them The Books of things which had been left out: yet this is less proper than the original name; for there are many repetitions of facts before recorded, as well as further historical information. These repetitions, however, must not be deemed superfluous; for most of them in some degree, and some of them exceedingly, elucidate the preceding history: and the few, that seem not wanted in this respect, are suited to connect the whole into one narration, without referring to other books; which would be peculiarly useful, when copies of the whole Scriptures were both scarce and expensive.—In the genealogies there are several literal or verbal variations, from those found in other parts of Scripture: but it is evident, that many persons had more than one name, and were called by one or the other indiscriminately; and the spelling and pronunciation, in most languages, change considerably in a course of years. Some variations in the numerals have already been noted; and we are sometimes constrained to allow, that, probably, a trivial error of the transcriber has taken place: but there is no variation, which in the least interferes with our faith or practice, or weakens the external or internal evidence of the divine inspiration of the Scripture in general, or of these books in particular.—It was evidently a principal design of the sacred writer, in these records, to bring into one view, and comprise in a narrow compass, whatever immediately related to the nation of Israel, to each of the twelve tribes, and to the family of David, with reference to the settlement in the land after the captivity; and to ascertain the descent of the promised Messiah: and in both these respects, the genealogies would be very useful. Until Christ came, all the genealogies of that nation were preserved correct and authentic: but since that period, the Jews have none which can be depended on. The types were then fulfilled in the great Antitype; the kingdom and priesthood were permanently united in his person; and the nation soon forfeited their peculiar temporal advantages, by rejecting their King: and as their genealogies were no further needful, they were left to be involved in oblivion or uncertainty.—Many things might be very plain and useful to the ancient Jews, which appear obscure and uninteresting to us. Should it be allowed, that a small part of the Scripture was profitable to the church in some ages and places, but not at all in others, it would be no impeachment of the divine wisdom and goodness: and if we cannot understand or get any benefit from certain portions; it is more reasonable to blame our own dulness, than, so much as in thought, to censure them as useless.—The first book commences with genealogies from Adam, till long after the captivity; many of which are collected from other parts of Scripture. The advancement of David to the throne upon Saul's death, is next related: and a much fuller account is given of his internal government of the kingdom; especially, in the regulation concerning the priests and Levites, in the service of the sanctuary; the preparation that he made for the building of the temple; and the exhortations to Solomon his successor, and to the elders of Israel with which he closed his days, than in the preceding histories. And the sacred writer seems to have dwelt on these subjects the more fully, in order to stir up a holy emulation in his contemporaries, in restoring the worship at the temple to its ancient order and purity. So that in this book, "the man after God's own heart" shines much brighter, than in the second book of Samuel, and the beginning of the first of Kings.—The genealogies, given by St. Matthew and St. Luke, may be supposed to refer in many respects to those in this book. And when it is said that Zacharias was "of the course of Abia," the reference is still more indisputable. (24:10. Luke 1:5.)—The prophecies contained in it coincide indeed with those in the second of Samuel and in the Psalms; and therefore cannot be adduced as full proofs of its divine inspiration: but the sentiments which pervade it are perfectly scriptural; and we are sure it formed a part of the Jewish Scriptures, when our Savior and his apostles appealed to them, as "The oracles of God."

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1—4. This chapter consists wholly of extracts, and abridgments of genealogies, from the book of Genesis: though several names are spelt differently, and some are changed. (Marg. Ref.)—The original of Israel, and indeed of the whole human race, is in these verses derived from the first man, whom God created; and this rational account may be considered, as an intended refutation of all the fabulous, obscure, and absurd pretensions, advanced in this respect, by many pagan nations. (Notes, Gen. 1:1,26—28. 2:4,7. 5: 1,2.) 'No book in the world shews the original 'propagation of mankind, but only the holy scrip-'tures. They who were ignorant of them, having 'nothing of true antiquity, devised senseless fables 'of their descent, they knew not how, nor from 'whom. ... This was the peculiar glory of the Jew-'ish nation, that they alone were able to derive 'their pedigree from the first man that God creat-'ed; of which no other nation could boast, or make 'a shadow of pretence.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 5—23. (Notes, Gen. 9:24—29. 10:) This short review, of the peopling of the earth by the sons of Noah, might be intended to intimate, that we are all of one blood and nature, though of different families.

V. 24—27. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Gen. 11:10—32. 17:5,6.) 'Shem ... was the most eminent of 'Noah's sons, whom he solemnly blessed; the Mes-'siah being to spring from him. (Gen. 9:26.) For 'from Adam the promise of the Messiah was trans-'lated to Seth; and from Seth to Shem; from Shem 'to Eber; from whom the Hebrew nation, some 'think, derived their name; and had this precious 'promise committed to their trust, above all other 'nations in the world.' Bp. Patrick. (Note, Gen. 11:6—9.)

V. 38—42. Notes, Gen. 36:20,24.

V. 43—54. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Gen. 36:31—43.) When the sacred historian had given the genealogy of Abraham, the father of the faithful; he briefly mentions Abraham's descendants by Ishmael, by Keturah, and by Esau, with some coincident matters: but he speedily leaves these subjects, to confine himself to the chosen people of God, and the line of the Savior; in comparison with whom, the nations most renowned for arts or arms seem entirely disregarded.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

As we are descended from that "one man, by whom sin and death entered into the world;" so we all resemble and imitate him: and this should remind us how sinful and frail we are; and excite us to repent, to value the Savior, to despair of happiness in this miserable world, to seek those things which are above, and habitually to prepare to meet death, who is, to all unbelievers, "the king of terrors." For, as an invincible conqueror, he has already transmitted the bodies of innumerable millions to the grave, and their souls to the tribunal of God and to the eternal world; and is even now ready to deal with us in like manner. (Note, Rom. 5:20,21.) But while we are spared, we should regard every human being, as a brother, a fellow-sinner, and a fellow-sufferer, without respect to climate, complexion, party, character, or even personal injuries: and, with expanded benevolence and compassion we should aim to alleviate misery, to increase comfort, to promote peace, and to be instrumental to the salvation of men, by our example, prayers, and the improvement of our several talents.—Short is our passage through time into eternity:—we are no sooner born, than we begin to die; and all earthly distinctions will speedily be reduced to a level, as the rough weed, the green blade, and the gaudy flower fall before the indiscriminating scythe! May we then be distinguished as the Lord's people, who are his portion, and whom he delights to honor and bless.—The inconceivable multitudes of the human race, which have peopled or shall

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. Notes, Gen. 29:32—35. 30:1—24. 32:28. 35:17,18.

V. 3, 4. (Notes, Gen. 38:) The descendants of Judah are first mentioned; for that tribe (like him who was to spring from it) was in all respects to have the pre-eminence. (Notes, Gen. 49:8—10.)—Shelah. (3) Note, 4:21.

V. 5, 6. Marg. Ref.—The sons of Zerah, &c. (6) It is uncertain, whether Ethan, Heman, Calcol, and Dara, the sons of Mahol, of whom we read, (1 Kings 4:31.) were remote and eminent descendants of Zerah; or whether different persons, bearing nearly the same names, are there intended.

V. 7. (Notes, Josh. 7:1,10—24.) Achan, who sinned in the accursed thing, is here called Achar, or the troubler; with reference to Joshua's words to him. (Note, Josh. 7:25,26.) Carmi is said in Joshua to be the son of Zabdi, who is here called Zimri. (6)—The genealogies of Judah are very copious: because David, the progenitor of the Messiah, was of that tribe; and the whole nation of the Jews, to this day, is composed of such as either descended from Judah, or incorporated with those who did. (Note, 2 Kings 16:6.)

V. 8. "Sons" here signifies descendants. These might be numerous, though but one son is mentioned.

V. 9—12. Hezron, the son of Pharez. (5) (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ruth 4:17—22.)

V. 15. Jesse had eight sons; (1 Sam. 16:10.) but it is probable, that one died before David came to the throne. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17. Jether is generally supposed to have been an Ishmaelite by birth, but an Israelite by religion. (Note, 2 Sam. 17:25.)

V. 18—20. This Caleb, or Chelubai, (9) was not the same as Caleb the son of Jephunneh, whose posterity is afterwards mentioned. (4:15.) He must have lived some time before Israel left Egypt; as Bezaleel, who was the principal person employed in constructing the tabernacle, was his great grandson; the son of Uri, the son threescore years old, and she bare him Segub.

22 And Segub begat [g] Jair, who had three and twenty cities in the land of Gilead.

23 And he took [h] Geshur, and Aram, with the towns of Jair, from them, with Kenath and the towns thereof, even threescore cities: all these belonged to the sons of Machir the father of Gilead.

24 And after that Hezron was dead in [i] Caleb-ephratah, then Abiah, Hezron's wife, bare him [j] Ashur, the father of [k] Tekoa.

25 ¶ And the sons of [l] Jerahmeel, the first-born of Hezron, were Ram, the first-born, and Bunah, and Oren, and Ozem, and Ahijah.

26 Jerahmeel had also another wife, whose name was Atarah, she was the mother of Onam.

27 And the sons of [m] Ram, the first-born of Jerahmeel, were Maaz, and Jamin, and Eker.

28 And the sons of [n] Onam were Shammai, and Jada. And the sons of Shammai; Nadab, and Abishur.

29 And the name of the wife of Abishur was Abihail; and she bare him Ahban, and Molid.

30 And the sons of [o] Nadab; Seled, and Appaim: but Seled died without children.

31 And the sons of Appaim; Ishi. And the sons of Ishi; Sheshan. And [p] the children of Sheshan; Ahlai.

32 And the sons of Jada, the brother of Shammai; Jethur, and Jonathan: and Jethur died without children.

33 And the sons of Jonathan; Peleth, and Zaza. These were the sons of Jerahmeel.

34 ¶ Now Sheshan had no sons, but daughters: and Sheshan had a servant, an Egyptian, whose name was Jarha.

35 And [q] Sheshan gave his daughter to Jarha his servant to wife, and she bare him Attai.

36 And Attai begat Nathan, and Nathan begat [r] Zabad,

37 And Zabad begat Ephlal, and Ephlal begat Obed,

38 And Obed begat Jehu, and Jehu begat Azariah,

39 And Azariah begat Helez, and Helez begat Eleasah,

40 And Eleasah begat Sisamai, and Sisamai begat Shallum, 41 And Shallum begat Jekamiah, and Jekamiah begat Elishama.

42 ¶ Now the sons of [s] Caleb, the brother of Jerahmeel, were Mesha [t] his first-born, which was the father of [u] Ziph: and the sons of Mareshah, [x] the father of Hebron.

43 And the sons of Hebron; Korah, and Tapuah, and Rekem, and Shema.

44 And Shema begat Raham, the father of Jorkoam; and Rekem begat Shammai.

45 And the son of Shammai was Maon: and Maon was the father of [y] Bethzur.

46 And Ephah, [z] Caleb's concubine, bare Haran, and Moza, and Gazez: and Haran begat Gazez.

47 And the sons of Jahdai; Regem, and Jotham, and Geshan, and Pelet, and Ephah, and Shaaph.

48 Maachah, Caleb's [a] concubine, bare Sheber, and Tirhanah.

49 She bare also Shaaph [b] the father of [c] Madmannah, Sheva the father of Macbenah, and the father of [d] Gibea: and the daughter of Caleb was Achsa.

V. 21. "The father of Gilead" means, the prince of Gilead, or the father of a large portion of the inhabitants. The term occurs frequently in this sense, throughout the subsequent genealogies; as the reader will readilyperceive by consulting the marginal references. (Notes, 42—53.)

V. 22. Jair was descended by his father from Judah, and properly belonged to that tribe: but Hezron, his grandfather, married a wife of the tribe of Manasseh; and Jair, as descended from her, united himself to that tribe, and at length inherited among them. (Note, Num. 32:41.)

V. 24. Asher was the posthumous son of Hezron, by Abiah, whom he married in his old age. (21) But he became a man of consequence; and his descendants principally peopled, or ruled over, Tekoa.

V. 25—33. Nothing further is recorded of the persons mentioned in these verses. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 34—41. It does not appear that Sheshan had more than one daughter, whom he gave in marriage to his servant, an Egyptian; who, it is probable, was a proselyte to the true religion, and had been faithful to him. But, as a numerous progeny might spring from this one daughter, the plural number is used, as it was before observed to be in the case of sons. (Note, 8.)

read before. His children by Azubah and by Ephrath, had been enumerated: (Note, 18—20.) so that "Meshah, his first-born," seems to have been born to him by another wife, whom he married before either Azubah or Ephrath.—The Jews, when they returned from the captivity, were principally of the tribe of Judah: and so these genealogies might be exceedingly useful to them. No doubt they were extracted from ancient public records of allowed authenticity. (Marg. Ref.)

The cities, of which these persons are said to have been fathers, were all situated in Judah; and this confirms the preceding interpretation. (Note, 21.)

Achsa. (49) "Caleb the son of Jephunneh" had a daughter called Achsa, who was married to Othniel, at the time when Joshua completed the division of the land. (Notes, Josh. 15:16—19.) But Caleb the son of Hezron lived some ages before: (Note, 18—20.) and his daughter Achsa was a different person.

V. 50. Caleb, here spoken of, was the grandson of him before mentioned, and brother to Uri, the father of Bezaleel; the same as erected the tabernacle. (9,18,19,42.)

V. 52, 53. The inhabitants of these cities consisted in general of Shobal's descendants; or they were the principal persons among them. This seems to be equivalent to the phrase, "the father of Ziph, of Beth-lehem, &c." (42,43.)

V. 54. The word rendered "the house of Joab," seems to be a proper name, Beth-joab; for a place, not a family, is evidently meant.—'Beth-joab; so these words, we translate "the 'house of Joab" should be rendered; for he is 'not speaking of Joab's family, but of Caleb's.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 55. The Kenites, &c.] (Notes, Judg. 1:16. 4:11. Jer. 35:1—7,18,19.) It seems that some of the Kenites, the posterity of Hobab, incorporated with Judah, and became expert in writing, and eminent in their knowledge of the law of God.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

No length of time will expunge the guilt or infamy of those, who do evil in the sight of the Lord, are troublers of his people, and die in their sins. But, as the Savior was pleased to assume human nature, by descent through so many a heinous transgressor, and thus to be "made in the likeness of sinful flesh," as well as a sacrifice for sin, all manner of wickedness shall be purged away from those who believe in his name.—Frequently the last become first, and the first last; and atrocious sinners have in every age been transformed into the most eminent believers.—Difficulties, blemishes, and disgraces in the beginnings of life, or on the entrance of any undertaking; and remarkable blots in the origin of families; have often proved as foils to the lustre, success, or eminence, with which they were afterwards favored. In the same wise, righteous, and merciful sovereignty, the Lord advances or depresses the branches of families; prospers or renders unsuccessful our temporal pursuits; replenishes or diminishes our households, and renders them a comfort or a trial to us. Submission to his will is our duty and wisdom; but it is the privilege of the true believer alone to maintain this happy frame of mind. In Christ, however, there is neither bond nor free, neither male nor female, neither Jew nor Gentile: all who come to him are equally welcome to his salvation; all are equally privileged, in proportion to their faith, love, and devotedness to him: and it is a peculiar favor for poor strangers to be made "scribes well instructed in the kingdom of God," and to be fitted also for usefulness to others. In short, the whole, that is truly valuable, consists in the favor, peace, and image of God; and a life spent to his glory, and in promoting the welfare of our fellow-creatures.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—9. (Notes, 2 Sam. 3:1—5. 5:13—16.) David's other sons by Bathshua, or Bathsheba, are mentioned before Solomon, though younger than he; because the genealogy is resumed from him. Probably David called one of them Nathan, out of respect to the prophet of that name, whom he loved the better for his faithful reproof. Mary the mother of Jesus was descended from Nathan, not from Solomon. (Notes, Luke 3:23—38.) The two sons, which are here mentioned, more than in Samuel, probably died young; as there are two called Elishama, and two Eliphelet. (Marg. Ref.)—It seems that David had children by his concubines, whose names are no where recorded.

V. 10—15. (Marg. Ref.) Johanan seems to have died young. Shallum is also called Jehoahaz. He was older than Zedekiah, though mentioned after him. (Note, 2 Kings 23:29,30, v. 30.)

V. 16. As the sons of Jeconiah are enumerated in the next verses, and as Zedekiah, a son of Jeconiah, is not elsewhere mentioned, it is thought by learned men, that "his son" here means his successor.

V. 17, 18. Many commentators take it for granted, that Salathiel, or Shealtiel, actually descended from Nathan, and was only the adoptive son of Jeconiah; that Solomon's line was extinct; and that Joseph, the husband of Mary, sprang from Nathan, as well as she. They ground this sentiment on these reasons: Jeremiah is supposed to have pronounced Jeconiah childless; but perhaps a satisfactory solution of that difficulty may be adduced. (Note, Jer. 22:28—30.) Again, it is argued, that St Luke mentions Zorobabel, the son of Salathiel, in the genealogy of Mary. But to this it may be answered, that it is scarcely the shadow of an argument to say, because a father and son are of the same names in one genealogy, as they are in another, therefore they were the same persons, when no other part of the genealogy supports, or can possibly accord with, the conclusion. Salathiel, the father of Zorobabel, mentioned by St. Luke, was "the son of Rhesa, the son of Joanna, the son of Judah;" this Salathiel was the "son of Assir, the son of Jeconiah."—'Rhesa, (Luke 3:27.) ... is not found among the 'eight children, that are here reckoned up.' Bp. Patrick. Matthew says, Jeconiah begat Salathiel; and it will be harsh to interpret this of mere adoption, or of less than being his progenitor; and here are several other sons, or descendants, of Jeconiah mentioned, who cannot all have been adopted. Upon the whole it scarcely admits of a doubt, that the line from Solomon to Joseph was uninterrupted; and that the two families met in Jesus, the real son of Mary, and the supposed and legal son of Joseph. (Notes, Matt. 1:2—17. Luke 3:23—38.)

V. 19—24. Perhaps Pedaiah was Salathiel's son, Jeconiah's grandson, and Zerubbabel's father: but, being of small note, his name is omitted in the other genealogies, which is a common case. Nothing is known except the names of the persons afterwards mentioned; but several of them must have lived a long time after the captivity, perhaps later than the days of Ezra. St.

Matthew evidently deduces the line of Joseph from a different branch of the same stock: that is, from another branch of Zerubbabel's descendants. (Matt. 1:13—16.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In the large families of wise, eminent, and pious men, many persons prove too insignificant to attract our notice, and others so vicious as to excite our grief and indignation. They therefore, who have no children, may hence learn submission to the will of God: for if, by that appointment, they are destitute of some comforts, they are also exempted from a variety of anxieties and trials. And those, to whom God has given children, may learn to bring up their offspring for him to the best of their power, recommending them to his care and blessing: nor should they indulge the hope of much comfort from them, any more than seek great things for them, in this vain and vexatious world. Yet, upon the whole, the attentive and accurate observer will perceive that the posterity of the righteous enjoy advantages, sometimes for many generations, in consequence of the piety of their progenitors: so that this is the best way of laying up an inheritance for our beloved offspring.—Nothing more distinguishes the real believer from the slave of sin, than the manner in which each of them behaves towards a faithful reprover: the former, upon reflection, will love and revere him as his best friend; the latter will habitually hate him as his enemy. (5. 2 Sam. 12:1—7,13. 1 Kings 21:20. 22:8. Ps. 141:5.) But all our gratitude to the instruments of our mercies should be ultimately directed to the glory of God: and all the prosperity of ourselves and our families will eventually terminate in misery, unless it centre in union with the Son of David, the King of Israel, and the Savior of sinners.

NOTES.

Chap. IV. V. 1. Carmi seems to mean the same person before called Chelubai, and Caleb. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 2:18—20,42—49, v. 42.)

V. 2—4. The Zorathites were the inhabitants of Zorah: but they in general descended from Shobal, or were subject to him. "The father of Etam," seems to imply, that the persons spoken of were the sons of one, who was lord of Etam, and progenitor of its principal inhabitants.—Hur appears to have been the grandfather of Salma, who before was called the father of Beth-lehem. (Note, 2:52,53.)

V. 5—8. Marg. Ref.

V. 9, 10. Nothing is recorded concerning the parentage or family of this remarkable person: but, as he was eminent for valor, success, wisdom, or piety, it is probable, that the Jews did not want information concerning him. It must be supposed, that he lived soon after Israel took possession of Canaan; and when they were greatly straitened by the remains of the ancient inhabitants. His mother, having suffered much, in her pregnancy or travail, called him "Jabez," or, Sorrowful; (marg.) but her sorrow was emphatically turned into joy, if she lived to see how eminent and excellent a man he proved. His achievements are not recorded; but his prayers are, for our instruction and imitation. He was a genuine son of Jacob, who wrestled, and so prevailed with God, refusing to depart without a blessing, and on that account was surnamed Israel. (Notes, Gen. 32:24—30.) From a full heart, Jabez earnestly entreated the God of Israel to "bless him indeed;" and neither to send him away without a blessing, nor merely to bless him, like Esau, with temporal blessings. (Note, Gen. 27:38.) He seems to have been constrained to fight against the Canaanites: but he conducted the war with faith and prayer; and he entreated the Lord to be with him, and both to enlarge his coast, and to preserve him from disastrous events, which might occasion grief unto him.—Believers, under the Old Testament, saw, in the land of Canaan, a type of heaven; in their wars was represented the conflict of God's people with their enemies; and every clause of his prayer may be applied to, and doubtless was intended for, more noble and spiritual blessings. Accordingly, the Lord heard and granted his requests, and thus he became honorable, as well as prosperous, in Israel.—The Jews think that Jabez was an eminent Doctor of the law, and that "the Scribes which dwelt at Jabez" were his disciples. (2:55)—This instructive example, in the midst of genealogies, to us so abstruse, seems like the fragrant rose, surrounded by thorns; or as refreshing streams in the desert: and it appears a recompense intended for the careful student of God's word, who diligently and reverently examines the whole, comparing one part with another, without disregarding or undervaluing any.

She bare. (17) That is, Bithiah the daughter of Pharaoh bare to Mered: (18) for these appear to have been Ezra's grandsons. Many think that Pharaoh was the name of an Israelite; yet it is not impossible that Mered might marry a daughter of an Egyptian king, by some of his concubines.—Father of, &c.] Notes, 2:21,42—49, v. 49.

V. 20. Shimon is supposed to have been another son of Mered, by Hodiah, or Jehudijah. (18 19.) As the name signifies a Jewess, (18, marg.) it rather favors the opinion, that Bithiah was not a Jewess, but an Egyptian.

V. 21. The sacred historian had mentioned the descendants of Judah by Zerah; (2:6—8.) and having more copiously given the genealogies of Judah's posterity by Pharez, he here mentions briefly a few of the line of Shelah, the son of Judah, by the Canaanitish woman whom he married; and who was his eldest surviving son. (Notes, Gen. 38:4,5,11—16,24. Neh. 11:4,6.)

V. 22, 23. Perhaps these families, in the time of David, or Solomon, when Moab was subjected, had dominion there; but in process of time they were so reduced, as to subsist by the meanest employments. Their honor and dignity "were ancient things;" for at the time when this was written, they were brought very low.—Some think that they remained near Babylon, after the return of Judah from the captivity, "among plants and hedges," for the sake of doing the work of the Persian kings.—It was common in those ages, and still is in many places, for particular trades and professions to be continued in families, through successive generations.

V. 24. The families of Simeon are mentioned next to those of Judah, because their inheritances

V. 39—43. Part of the Simeonites joined the house of David, when the ten tribes revolted: (Note, 2 Chr. 15:9.) and, being greatly increased in the time of Hezekiah, they dispossessed some of the ancient Canaanites, who still kept possession of a plentiful and peaceful country, fit for the feeding of cattle.—Perhaps this tract belonged to the Simeonites in the division of the land, and at length they got possession of it. Some however think, that a country towards Arabia, without the borders of the promised land, is intended. It seems that the remains of the Amalekites, after the general destruction of them made by Saul and David, had settled near to the Edomites, in mount Seir: but this remnant was extirpated by a small company of Simeonites.—Some think, that the kings of Babylon permitted this part of Simeon to remain unmolested in their possessions, through the captivity, even to the time of Ezra: but perhaps Ezra extracted the words, "unto this day," from the ancient records without altering them.—The habitations. (41) Or the Meunnim, or Maonites. (Heb.—Judg. 10:12. 2 Chr. 26:7.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Children should consider how much their parents, especially their mothers, suffered for them, before they became capable of reflection; and they should endeavor by every means to requite them, as much as possible, by kindness, and by aiming to be a comfort to them, in their whole conduct. But it is basely ungrateful, (though alas! very common,) willingly to cause them still more exquisite and durable anguish, by ill-behavior.—Those events, which at first occasion most sorrow, often terminate in the greatest comfort: we should not therefore yield to despondency, but "hope to the end," and expect to extract good from every apparent evil.—But it is natural for us to record our sorrows rather than our mercies; though, considering our guilt and sinfulness, we may reasonably wonder that the latter are so many, and the former so few.—"The honor, which cometh from God," is introduced by the gifts of wisdom, faith, and piety; and when these are bestowed, men will at length be honorable, whether they be renowned and prosperous, or not.—We go about our proper work in a right manner, when we use lawful and suitable means for success with all assiduity, and seek a blessing on them by fervent prayer.—A confluence of all earthly good things cannot "bless us indeed:" the true felicity, which our hearts should eagerly desire, consists in the favor, image, and presence of God; and we should pray for this, as resolved not to depart without it. The pardon of sin, the gift of righteousness, and the first-fruits of the Spirit, form the beginning of this happiness: but the world, Satan, and indwelling sin, crowd and straiten us on every side, and keep us from the possession of our inheritance. We should then beg of "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" to enlarge our coast, that we may attain to greater holiness, liberty, comfort, and usefulness; and acquire a more decisive victory over our enemies. And if his "hand be with us," if his power be exerted in our cause, we shall be protected, upheld, and enabled to withstand, and to gain ground against, the confederated forces of the world, the flesh, and the devil. We may very properly, with resignation, pray to be kept from the evil of suffering, which is grievous to nature; but the evil of sinning most affrights and disquiets the spiritually minded: this extorts their bitterest groans and complaints; against this they most earnestly pray, "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil." And, being kept from the burden of a guilty conscience, and the anguish of having dishonored and offended the God of their salvation, they can the better bear up under other trials, as supported by that "peace of God which passeth all understanding." Blessed be the Lord, he is ever ready to grant and to exceed our prayers for promised blessings: and we are our own enemies, if we do not ask and expect great things from him, through the Savior's name.—In this checkered world indeed, there is nothing durable or substantial: but possessing the hope of unchangeable felicity, we may cheerfully acquiesce in the Lord's allotment of our worldly settlements and occupations. Nor is it desirable to advance our children much above our own rank; for those, who at one time have dominion, may at another become dependent on the worst of men for a penurious maintenance: whereas honest labor, in some regular and useful calling, best preserves that mediocrity which is most comfortable, and most advantageous to our spiritual concerns. Let us then adhere to the kingdom of "the Son of David:" for this "Prince of peace" will supply the temporal wants of his people with every thing truly desirable, and make them happy for ever, while his curse will pursue all his enemies to their utter destruction.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1, 2 The double portion, which belonged to the first-born, having been forfeited by Reuben, Jacob's eldest son by Leah, was given to Joseph, his eldest son by Rachel, whose descendants had a double portion in Canaan; Jacob having adopted Ephraim and Manasseh, to be, as his own sons, heads of two distinct tribes. (Notes, Gen. 48:5—7. 49:3—12,22—26.)—Yet, as the chief Ruler, or Prince, even the Messiah, of whom David and his royal race were progenitors and types, was to descend from Judah; the genealogy began with him, and not with either Reuben or Joseph. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3—8. Very brief extracts are made from the registers of Reuben, and of several other tribes: because, it is probable, but few persons of these tribes, returned from the captivity to settle in Canaan: and therefore only a few of these tribes were concerned in the genealogies, compared with the numbers of Judah, Benjamin, and Levi, of whom the Jews after that event principally consisted. It may be supposed, that Ezra's contemporaries would see the reason, why the persons selected should be named, and not others; though we can assign none.—This chapter contains all that relates to the two tribes and a half, which settled to the east of Jordan. (Notes, Num. 32: Josh. 22:)

V. 9. The inheritance of Reuben extended to the borders of that desert, which reached even to the Euphrates.

V. 10. Note, 18—22.

19 And they [y] made war with the Hagarites, with Jetur, and [z] Nephish, and Nodab.

20 And [a] they were helped against them, and the Hagarites were delivered into their hand, and all that were with them: for [b] they cried to God in the battle, and he was entreated of them; [c] because they put their trust in him.

V. 11—17. (Marg. Ref.) Part of the genealogies of Gad, whence these extracts were taken, seems to have been made during the time, that Jeroboam the second reigned over Israel, and the rest when Jotham reigned in Judah.

V. 18—22. The Hagarites were the descendants of Hagar, or the Ishmaelites properly so called; (Marg. Ref. 19.) and being a nation of plunderers, they would not fail to give their neighbors just cause of making war upon them. (Note, Gen. 16:12.) But, indeed, "the war was of God," (22) undertaken in his fear, and in dependence on him, and was approved and succeeded by him: so that the victors and their descendants dwelt in the country thus acquired, till they were carried captive by the Assyrians. If this was the same war, as was before mentioned, (10) the two tribes and half tribe beyond Jordan might be left, during a part of Saul's reign, to defend themselves: but some think that these tribes were numbered by genealogies, in the days of Jeroboam and Jotham, in order to make war against the Hagarites. (17) They, however, acted in concert and with vigor, and with faith and prayer, against these formidable enemies. But especially it is noted, that they trusted in God, and called upon him in the battle, in the first onset of which the Hagarites, probably, obtained some advantage; and their success accorded to their faith.—The multitude of the prisoners may give an idea of the superiority in numbers of the enemy, and of the slaughter which was made.—The Ishmaelites have always been remarkable for the numbers of camels, which they take with them in their expeditions.—When we read of this conduct and success of these Israelites, we are ready to say, "Oh, that there had" always "been such an heart in them!" but the conclusion of the chapter gives us a different view of their character and condition.

V. 25, 26. The Manassites, with the Reubenites and Gadites, forsook God, to worship idols; and the nation of Israel generally did the same: yet, the two tribes and a half seem to have been more early and entirely corrupted, than the other tribes. —Their progenitors had hastily desired a settlement to the east of Jordan; and now these tribes were carried captive before the rest of Israel. (Notes, Num. 32:1—5,29. 2 Kings 15:19,20,29.) But they were placed in the same regions by Pul and Tilgath-pilneser, to which Shalmaneser afterwards carried the other tribes. (Notes, 2 Kings 17:5,6. 18:9—12.)—Hara is supposed to be the same as Media, or part of it.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is profitable to be frequently reminded, that sin degrades men from their excellency, stamps indelible disgrace on their characters, forfeits their advantages, and entails manifold losses on their posterity. But, the Lord punishes none above their deserts; and, as he sees good, he confers unmerited favors on mankind.—They, who are related to our chief Ruler of the tribe of Judah, as his true disciples and subjects, are far more favored, than those who have a two-fold, or ten-fold, portion of perishing riches. Let us seek and choose this better portion; and leave the children of this world to contend about their gilded baubles, without envying, coveting, or interfering. We need not in that case fear wanting any thing truly good for us, "for our Father knoweth what things we have need of:" when our families increase, he will increase our provision; and it is our privilege to cast our care on him, and to keep in the path of duty.—Happy is that people who live together in harmony, who readily assist each other; who strenuously oppose the common enemies of their souls; and who acknowledge God in all their ways, but are especially earnest in times of trial and temptation. Such persons will assuredly be heard and helped; their warfare is of God, their enemies will be trodden down, their victory is certain, and their triumphs will be glorious.—And let it be carefully noticed, that all genuine and warranted trust in God will be expressed by earnest prayer; and this in part distinguishes it from a presumptuous confidence, and an indolent reliance, which often subsist without application to him, or habitual prayer; and are especially maintained by lifeless forms, and inefficacious notions. —Those who rebel against the Lord, and apostatize from him, must eventually be ruined: especially, such as desert his worship and reject his salvation, for the sake of those idols which are set up either in temples, or in the hearts of the avaricious, the sensual, or the ambitious. It will little avail them, to have their names inserted in the genealogies of honorable families, or recorded as famous in the page of history, while they are rejected by God, and excluded from his kingdom.—We should consider, that those actions, which are vain, foolish, and wicked in man, may be permitted and made use of by the Lord in justice, wisdom, and goodness. From him the renowned ravagers of the earth derive their power and courage: and they are employed as his executioners, and classed with pestilences, earthquakes, and famines; being equally dreadful and fatal to mankind. Nor should we forget, that they, whose inordinate desire of earthly objects draws them to a distance from the ordinances of God, are assuredly preparing for their own correction, or destruction.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1—3. Notes, Ex. 6:14—20. Lev. 10:1,2.

V. 4—15. These verses contain the line of Eleazar, Aaron's eldest surviving son after the death of Nadab and Abihu, to the Babylonish captivity: but all the persons mentioned were not high priests, for Ithamar's posterity enjoyed that dignity for some time. (Notes, 24:1—4. 1 Sam. 2:30, 35,36. 1 Kings 2:26,27,35.)—"He ... that executed the priest's office in the temple that Solomon built," (an intimation that the writer lived when the second temple was built or building,) is supposed to have been Azariah, who vigorously opposed Uzziah's presumptuous attempt to burn incense. (Note, 2 Chr. 26:16—23.) His father Johanan is thought by some to have been the same as Jehoiada, the firm friend to religion and the family of David, during Athaliah's usurpation. (Notes, 2 Kings 11: 12: 2 Chr. 23: 24:) Otherwise Jehoiada is not mentioned.—Urijah, who basely obeyed idolatrous Ahaz, is not named in this catalogue, and perhaps several others are omitted. (Marg. Ref.)—It is wonderful, that so little is recorded of the high priests, when the office is represented in the law, and by St. Paul in his epistle to the Hebrews, as of a peculiar sanctity and importance

V. 16—30. The principal persons, who presided over the three families of Levi, till the time of David, seem to be mentioned in these verses.—The marginal references contain the variation in the names given to the same persons, in different parts of sacred history, as far as it can be ascertained; and nearly the whole, that is at present known concerning them, may be learned by carefully consulting them.—Samuel the son of Elkanah (27,33,34.) was not a priest, but descended from Izhar, Aaron's uncle: yet, as a prophet, he sacrificed personally, and not by the ministration of the priests, as some have conjectured. (Notes, 1 Sam. 7:9. 9:12—14. 16:1—5.)

V. 31, 32. After the tabernacle had been made stationary, and the Levites had greatly multiplied; David formed arrangements for their regular ministering by rotation: and especially a large number of them were employed as singers and musicians, in celebrating the praises of God. (Notes, 9:31—33, v. 33. 16:4—6,37—43. 25: 26:) This was settled before the building of the temple, but it was continued afterwards. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 33—38. Heman was grandson to Samuel, or Shemuel, the prophet and judge of Israel; and probably he was advanced to this office, in honor of his illustrious ancestor. The genealogies of Heman, and Asaph, and Ethan, are carried back to Levi: whence we may infer that their station, as precentors, was considered as both important and honorable.—Heman, mentioned with Ethan of the sons of Zerah, was of the tribe of Judah. (Notes, 2:5,6. 1 Kings 4:30—34, v. 31.)

V. 39—47. Marg. Ref.—His brother Asaph. (39) As Asaph was of the same tribe with Heman, he is called his brother, though belonging to a different family of that tribe, for he was descended from Gershom; but Heman, from Kohath.

V. 48. 'It is observable, that in all genealo-'gies of the Levites, there is not a word said of 62 And to the sons of [q] Gershom throughout their families, out of the tribe of Issachar, and out of the tribe of Asher, and out of the tribe of Naphtali, and out of the tribe of Manasseh in Bashan, thirteen cities.

V. 67—81. Either some of the cities, or their names, had been changed since the time of Joshua: but, as Mr. Henry observes, Salop and Shrewsbury, Sarum and Salisbury, are as different names for the same places, as any in these catalogues; yet those, who live in their vicinity, are not at all confused by them.—Some cities also are here mentioned, as having belonged to Ephraim, which in Joshua are spoken of as cities of Dan: but various changes in such matters would occur in a course of ages.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In the judgment of God, none of the human race are more honorable or valuable, than those who consistently minister in holy things. And though many, who bear this sacred character, render themselves insignificant by their indolence, contemptible by their covetousness, or odious by their profligacy, or bring the divine vengeance upon themselves by offering "strange fire before the Lord:" (Note, Lev. 10:1,2.) yet, instead of that order being despised on these accounts, those who are singularly humble, diligent, disinterested, zealous, and valiant for the truth, ought to be treated with the greater respect; and of this, God himself has condescended to set the example in his holy word.—None of the Lord's people, and especially of his ministers, should be unemployed: they who, through want of ability or change of circumstances, are precluded from one method of glorifying God, should set themselves to devise another. And if they deem nothing, which may conduce to the advancement of true religion, too laborious, mean, disgusting, or discouraging; if they be disposed to be "instant in season, and out of season;" to instruct, or encourage, one, ten, or ten thousand, in public, or in private, in a cottage, an hospital, a prison, or a palace; in safe and easy, or in difficult and perilous circumstances; if they consider nothing too little to be attended to, and nothing too arduous to be attempted; and if they do all in sincerity, humility, and simplicity of spirit, they cannot long be unoccupied or useless. But, nothing can be a more pleasant and honorable work, than to excite or assist the devotions of the pious, and to lead them to abound in thanksgivings and praises to the Lord.—If a rich inheritance, or the important station of a magistrate or civil governor, could with propriety be quitted for such a service, the enlightened understanding must perceive it to be an honorable and advantageous exchange; for this is the delightful employment of those above, who are arrived at their eternal rest.—They, who have shewn themselves peculiarly disinterested in the cause of God and his people, should be peculiarly considered by their brethren, and their families respected for their sakes. But, though Christians and ministers may be very useful to the church, while "they wait in their offices," none but our great High Priest can make atonement for sin, none can be accepted, save through his atonement and mediation.—While ministers are bound to wait on their ministering, according to the work of their place; the people are equally bound, in their several stations, to strengthen their hands, and to contribute without grudging to their comfortable maintenance: and in every good work, equality and unanimity will render the burden light, and conduce to the comfort of all concerned, as also to render their endeavors more generally useful.

descendants of Tola by Uzzi; and the 22,600, his descendants by Tola's other sons; or whether another of Issachar's sons is intended, does not clearly appear: for Uzzi was the son of Tola and grandson of Issachar. Izrahiah and his five sons are spoken of as five sons of Uzzi. (3) If the former be meant, which seems the more obvious meaning, by far the greatest part of the tribe of Issachar descended from Tola.

V. 6—11. The persons mentioned seem not, strictly speaking, to have been the sons of Bela and Becher; but renowned persons among their descendants, or such as were progenitors of those who returned from Babylon. (Notes, 8:1—5. Gen. 46:21.)

V. 12. Aher.] Aher signifies another, and it has been conjectured, that these were Danites, 'the sons of another tribe;' especially as Hushim is named as the only son of Dan. (Gen. 46:23.) And they suppose, that the name of Dan was not mentioned, because his descendants first established idolatry. But Zebulun, as well as Dan, is here omitted; perhaps, because none of either of these tribes returned at first from Babylon.—Though the Benjamites had been almost destroyed, in the first days of the judges, they soon became numerous and powerful. (Notes, Judg. 20: 21:)

V. 14, 15. Ashriel was Manasseh's eldest son by his wife, who is not named: but a Syrian concubine was the mother of Machir, from whom the whole of that numerous tribe seems to have descended: for Ashriel as the son of Manasseh is not mentioned elsewhere; and Zelophehad "the second" was a descendant of Machir, two generations having intervened between them: for he was the son of Hepher, the son of Gilead, the son of Machir. (Num. 26:29—33.—Notes, Num. 27:1—11. 36:1—12. Josh. 17:1—6.)—"Of Asriel the family of the Asrielites." (Num. 26: 31.) This Asriel was a descendant of Machir by Gilead. Machir married a descendant of Benjamin.

V. 18. Hammoleketh seems to have been the sister of Gilead: though some think she was the sister of Bedan. (17)

V. 21, 22. Ezer and Elead seem to have been the sons, or grandsons, of Ephraim, and not his more remote descendants; for it is evident that he was living when they were slain. Some think, that they supposed the time was arrived for the nation to inherit Canaan; and so made an unsuccessful invasion of it. But, it is more likely, that some inhabitants of Gath, who had been natives of Egypt, made an incursion into

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Events frequently occur entirely beyond our expectations, and contrary to probabilities; the dispensations of Providence seem to run counter to the promises, in order that their performance may be the more observed and admired; and often a good cause is unsuccessful, while the wicked triumph in the success of their villany: but the day of judgment will clear up, and rectify, all such apparent obliquities in the divine administration.—Those who live long often become like the decaying tree, which stands till all its branches are withered, or broken off one after another. But, though the premature death of our children must necessarily be afflictive, and it behoves us all mutually to comfort each other; yet, we should not mourn as men without hope; for the Lord is able to make up all our losses. Considering our state on earth, we may properly call all our children Beriah; (marg.) for "man is born to trouble, as the sparks fly upwards." But the supports, consolations, and prospects, which the gospel brings to believers, are sufficient to counterbalance every evil, and to render both life and death tolerable, if not joyful.—As men readily venture their lives to preserve their cattle or property; surely we should be willing to renounce, venture, and suffer any thing, for the sake of Jesus Christ and his precious salvation.

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1—5. (Note, 7:7—11.) The tribe of Benjamin adhered to Judah, in the division of the kingdom, and returned with the Jews from Babylon: and, as the history is about to open with the translation of the kingdom from Saul of that tribe, to David of Judah; we have here a more copious account given of it than of several other tribes. But either some of the sons of Benjamin had several names, or those called his sons were his more remote descendants. Gera,

6 And these are the sons of [f] Ehud: these are the heads of the fathers of the inhabitants of [g] Geba, and they removed them to [h] Manahath:

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord delights to exalt those who have been abased; and to honor those who adhere to him, and to the King whom he has placed upon his holy hill of Zion, to his chosen people, and to his instituted worship. Numbers of renowned names are now buried in oblivion; but as God honors some of those, who have been faithful and useful in their generation, by recording their names in the sacred Scriptures; so he writes the names of all his people in the book of life. May this be our privilege, however unnoticed in the partial histories of mankind!—Alas! what will it avail those, who perish in an unequal contest with the Almighty, to be admired as men of valor and activity by their fellow-creatures! Let us seek to make our peace with God; and for his sake, and after his example, to forgive our enemies, and shew a decent respect to their memories: and still more to express affection and gratitude to those who have been kind and useful to us, not neglecting the credit and interests of their posterity.

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1. This verse seems to be the sacred writer's account of the book, or books, from which he had transcribed the preceding genealogies. Both Israel and Judah had been thus reckoned, or registered; and he had made extracts from the books of the two kingdoms, which had been written before the captivity. (Notes, Neh. 7:5,6.) The ten tribes had been carried into regions at a considerable distance from Babylon: but they were, at the time to which this refers, in general, subject to the kings of Babylon. (2 Kings 17:6. 18:11. 19:12, 13. Am. 5:25—27.)

V. 2. The persons who first, after the captivity, regained possession of their cities and lands, contained among them, not only Jews properly so called, but many Israelites from the other tribes; and also a number of priests, Levites, and Nethinim. (Notes, Neh. 11:1—3.)—The Nethinim were the remainder of the Gibeonites, with others perhaps joined with them, who were given as servants to the priests and Levites. The word signifies given, or, dedicated persons. (Notes, Josh. 9:27. 1 Kings 9:20—22. Ezra 2: 55—58. 8:20.)

V. 3—9. From the subsequent names of the priests and Levites, it is probable, that the sacred writer is speaking of the transactions recorded by Nehemiah; (Note, Neh. 11:4—6.) yet the names here mentioned so differ from those in the parallel passage, that it can hardly be supposed the same persons are always meant.—But, in these matters there are difficulties, which are perhaps incapable of a satisfactory solution at this distance of time, though the whole might be plain to those, for whose use it was principally intended.

Uthai, &c. (4) 'Now he sets down their names; 'and first those of the tribe of Judah.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 11. "The ruler of the house of God" does not signify the high priest, but "the second priest," who officiated for him when incapacitated; or one of the chief priests, who superintended the affairs of the temple in all ordinary cases. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Neh. 11:10—15.)

V. 12—18. Several names seem to be omitted, in the genealogies of these persons, and others introduced, which are elsewhere omitted: but the names are so far the same, as to shew that the transactions recorded by Nehemiah are intended. (Notes, Neh. 11:10—19. 12:1—11.)

V. 19—21. It has been conjectured that the Jews, upon their return from Babylon, prepared a tabernacle for the worship of the Lord, before they had courage or ability to rebuild the temple. But the inspired historian evidently spoke of the times of Nehemiah; and the temple had been finished many years before.—The word tabernacle may, therefore, refer to the sanctuary erected by Moses, which the temple, built after the captivity, more resembled, than it did Solomon's magnificent edifice. Indeed, the sanctuary at first was only a tent, or tabernacle, when Phinehas superintended it, in time past: yet, "the LORD was with him." (Notes, Num. 3:32. 4:27,28. 31:4—6.)—This seems to have been mentioned, as an instruction and encouragement to the priests and Levites, in the times of Ezra and Nehemiah: for there can be no reasonable doubt that Phinehas the grandson of Aaron was intended.—Among numerous instances in which the WORD of the LORD is used, by the Jewish paraphrasts, personally for JEHOVAH, the following may be adduced: 'In the Targum, 'The WORD of the LORD was his Helper.—From 'whence Beckius frames this argument:—that 'if he who was with Phinehas was JEHOVAH 'the true God, and this WORD was with Phin-'ehas; then the WORD, in the opinion of this 'paraphrast, was JEHOVAH the true God.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 22. Samuel seems to have made some regulations respecting the attendance of the Levites, before those which David afterwards established: indeed, some think, that David received those instructions from Samuel, according to which he regulated the courses of the priests and Levites. (Marg. Ref.)—When the Jews returned from Babylon, they ordered these matters with respect to those appointments.

V. 23. (Marg. Ref.) The expression here used, "the house of the tabernacle," is considered by many as confirming the opinion before mentioned, that a tabernacle was erected, after the captivity, till the temple was finished. (Note, 19—21.) No doubt can, I suppose, be made as to the fact: but if the sacred historian wrote of Nehemiah's time, whatever allusion he might make to that fact; it is certain, that the temple had been completed many years before.—When David made those regulations concerning the courses and services of the Levites, there was no temple; but the ministrations were performed at the tabernacle: and perhaps on that account, "the house of the tabernacle" is mentioned.

V. 27—29. The gold and silver vessels, and other treasures appropriated to the service of God, were deposited in the treasuries of the sanctuary; and the Levites lodged around it, as the appointed guard of them, as well as to be ready for their work. (26:20—28. Note, Ezra 8:24—27.)

V. 30. The Levites kept guard over the deposit of spices and frankincense, as well as over the other treasures: but the priests compounded the holy oil and incense. (Notes, Ex. 30:22—38.) It seems, however, that Bezaleel of Judah, made them in the time of Moses. (Ex. 37:1,29.)

V. 31—33. Marg. Ref.—Singers. (33) A number of the Levites were employed, by rotation, in singing praises to the LORD; and they seem to have continued the service, night and day; and consequently were exempted from other employments, and also from paying tribute. V. 35—44. (Note, 8:29—40.) This repetition seems to have been intended merely as an introduction to the ensuing history.

Ner, &c. (39) (1 Sam. 14:50,51.) Perhaps Abiel, the father of Kish, was also called Ner.—Ner, the father of Abner or Abiner, (my father Ner,) was Saul's uncle, not his grandfather.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In remembering the miseries of man, we should be careful not to lose sight of his transgressions, that the justice of God in them may be acknowledged and adored.—When sinners repent, and forsake their sins, they are in the way of being extricated from trouble: and the affairs of church and state are likely to be well ordered, when men of all ranks and orders in the community concur in endeavors for that purpose.—Whatever politicians may suppose, no description of men are more essential to the real welfare of the state, than conscientious ministers of religion; and that service requires very able men, of clear heads and stedfast minds. God will raise up such persons, in those nations which he peculiarly favors; and qualify some for rulers in his church, and others for subordinate services: and it is well, when every one knows, and diligently attends to, his proper work; without envying or contemning any of his brethren. To be "a door-keeper in the house of the LORD" is an honorable employment: and if he be with us, it will both be comfortable to us, and profitable to others; but without this, our services will be formal, and our souls miserable.—If employed in the service of the sanctuary, we have a charge to keep, as well as a work to do; and those, who "watch for men's souls, as they that must give account," are intrusted with that which is unspeakably more valuable, than the richest treasures of silver and gold. They should therefore reside upon the spot, as much as possible; in order to be near and ready for their work, at every hour as occasion may require. To prepare bread for the sanctuary, in their stated public preaching, may perhaps be only expected from them every sabbath: but some parts of their work must be needful every day; and they should generally be exempted from other cares and employments, that they may give themselves wholly to the word of God and prayer. (P. O. Acts 6:1—7.) Blessed be his name! if indeed we Saul's defeat and death, 1—7. The Philistines abuse his dead body, 3—10. The men of Jabesh-gilead rescue it, with the bodies of his sons, 11, 12. Saul's sin; for which he died, and the kingdom was transferred to David, 13, 14.

B. C. 1056 NOW [a] the Philistines fought against Israel; and the men of Israel fled from before the Philistines, and fell down *slain in [b] mount Gilboa.

2 And the Philistines followed hard after Saul, and after his sons; and the Philistines slew [c] Jonathan, and [d] Abinadab, and Malchishua, [e] the sons of Saul.

3 And the battle [f] went sore against Saul, and the †archers ‡hit him, and [g] he was wounded of the archers.

4 Then said Saul to his armor-bearer, [h] Draw thy sword, and thrust me through therewith; lest these [i] uncircumcised come and §abuse me. But his armor-bearer would not; for [k] he was sore afraid. So [l] Saul took a sword and fell upon it.

5 And when his armor-bearer saw that Saul was dead, he fell likewise on the sword, and died.

6 So [m] Saul died, and his three sons, and all his house died together.

7 And when all the men of Israel, that were in the valley, saw that they fled, and that Saul and his sons were dead, [n] then they forsook their cities and fled: and the Philistines came and dwelt in them.

8 And it came to pass on the morrow, when the Philistines came [o] to strip the slain, that they found Saul and his sons fallen in mount Gilboa.

9 And when they had stripped him, they [p] took his head, and his armor, and sent into the land of the Philistines round about, to carry [q] tidings unto their idols, and to the people.

10 And they put his armor in the house of [r] their gods, and fastened his head [s] in the temple of Dagon.

11 And when [t] all Jabesh-gilead heard all that the Philistines had done to Saul, 12 They arose, all the valiant men, and took away the body of Saul, and the bodies of his sons, and brought them to Jabesh, and buried their bones under [u] the oak in Jabesh, and [x] fasted seven days.

13 ¶ So Saul died for his transgression, which he ||committed against the LORD, [y] even against the word of the LORD, which he kept not, and also [z] for asking counsel of one that had [a] a familiar spirit, to inquire of it;

14 And [b] inquired not of the LORD: therefore [c] he slew him, and [d] turned the kingdom unto David the son of ¶ Jesse.

CHAP. X. V. 1—12. Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1 Sam. 31:—All his house died, &c. (6) "All his men," in Samuel. 'All that were present with him 'in the battle: and his family had received such a 'blow, that it never recovered itself again. For 'though Ish-bosheth reigned over a part of the 'country, yet it was not in any splendor.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 13, 14. This history is repeated as an introduction to that of the kingdom of David. The Lord is said to have slain Saul, because he sentenced him to death, and gave Satan leave to tempt him to be his own executioner.—Is it possible, more strongly to mark the excessive criminality of consulting witches, conjurers, fortune-tellers, or sorcerers of any kind, real or pretended, than by representing Saul's conduct in this respect, as one principal reason of his rejection and awful end? (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1 Sam. 28:3—10.)

He inquired not, &c. (14) That is, he did not persevere in inquiring of the Lord; but gave it up as hopeless, and had recourse to the consulting of a witch. 'He was remiss and negligent 'saying, If God will not hear me, I will go and 'consult a familiar spirit.' Laniado, a Jew, in Bp. Patrick.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord punishes none except sinners; and no sinners can escape, who do not humbly cast themselves upon his mercy: but when transgressors inquire of God, and earnestly seek deliverance in his appointed way, they will certainly prevail; and if they be involved in domestic or national calamities in this world, they will be saved from the wrath to come.—Alas! many "reject his counsel, and will none of his reproof," till he leaves them to "eat of the fruit of their own ways, and to be filled with their own devices:" and numbers, who profess to seek the Lord, are so superficial in doing it, so soon weary of it, and so ready to listen to Satan's temptations, that God accounts it no inquiry at all. May we "seek the LORD, whilst he may be found," and till we have obtained pardon, peace and sanctifying grace; and are enabled to renounce all fellowship with the works and prince of darkness! And may the good Lord deliver us from unbelief, impatience, and despair, and teach us to trust in him, to obey and submit to his will, and to render due honor and kindness to all

Dav.d, by general consent, is made king over all Israel, at Hebron, 1—3. He takes Zion from the Jebusites; dwells there, and prospers. 4—9. The names and achievements of his principal warriors, 10—47.

THEN [a] all Israel gathered themselves to David unto [b] Hebron, saying, [c] Behold, we are thy bone and thy flesh.

2 And moreover * in time past, even when Saul was king, thou wast he [d] that leddest out and broughtest in Israel: and the LORD thy God said unto thee, [e] Thou shalt † feed my people Israel, and thou shalt be [f] ruler over my people Israel.

3 Therefore came all the [g] elders of Israel to the king to Hebron; and [h] David made a covenant with them in Hebron [i] before the LORD; and they [k] anointed David king over Israel, according to the word of the LORD ‡ by Samuel.

4 ¶ And [m] David and all Israel went to Jerusalem, which is [n] Jebus; where the Jebusites were, [o] the inhabitants of the land.

5 And the inhabitants of Jebus said to David, [p] Thou shalt not come hither. Nevertheless David took [q] the castle of Zion, which is [r] the city of David.

6 And David said, [s] Whosoever smiteth the Jebusites first shall be § chief and captain. [t] So Joab the son of Zeruiah went first up, and was chief.

7 And [u] David dwelt in the castle; therefore they called || it, The city of David.

8 And he built the city round about, even from [x] Millo round about: and Joab ¶ repaired the rest of the city.

12 And after him was [d] Eleazar the son of Dodo the [e] Ahohite, who was one of [f] the three mighties.

13 He was with David at [g] Pas-dammim, and there the Philistines were gathered together to battle, where was a parcel of ground full of barley; and the people fled from before the Philistines.

14 And they §§ set themselves in the midst of that parcel, and delivered it, and slew the Philistines: and [h] the LORD saved them by a great |||| deliverance.

15 ¶ Now three ¶¶ of the thirty captains went down to the rock to David, into [i] the cave of Adullam; and the host of the Philistines encamped in the valley of [l] Rephaim.

CHAP. XI. V. 1—3. In this recapitulation of the transactions, with which David's reign over all Israel was introduced, no mention is made of Ish-bosheth, or Abner, or of the seven first years after Saul's death: (Notes, 2 Sam. 1:—4:) but the narrative begins with his being submitted to, as God's appointed king, and as such anointed at Hebron, by the concurrence of the whole nation. (Notes, 2 Sam. 5:1—3.) It is here added, "according to the word of the LORD by Samuel." (Notes, 1 Sam. 13:13—15. 16:6—13.)

V. 4—8. Notes, 2 Sam. 5:6—9.—Joab, &c. (6) It is evident that Joab was, before this, high in authority under David; but he was, as a reward of his courage and conduct on this occasion, established commander in chief over the whole army.

V. 9. (2 Sam. 5:10.) David's increasing greatness, with the cause of it, is here emphatically stated.

V. 10—14. Note, 2 Sam. 23:8—12.—Who strengthened, &c. (10) 'Those valiant men ... 'that assisted him' (David) 'in his advancement, 'and helped to establish him in his author-'ity. They were such, in all likelihood, as had 'accompanied him, during his persecution by 'Saul, when they gave David many proofs of 'their valor and affection, as they also did after-'ward.' *Bp. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When the time arrives for the performance of God's word, those persons who before were the most averse to the things predicted, will concur in accomplishing them.—Kings should remember, and have need to be reminded, that they are not advanced for their own aggrandizement or self-indulgence; but that they should, with activity and vigor, provide for the defence and welfare of the nations over which they reign.—The desire of applause and pre-eminence seems to be the highest motive, of which carnal men are capable: but those, who are born from above, are actuated by purer and nobler principles. Yet, in seeking the glory of God and the good of man, by endeavoring to advance the kingdom of Jesus the Lord's anointed; they most effectually secure their own honor and exaltation.—The kingdom and glory of Christ will surely wax greater and greater, (the Lord of hosts being with him,) till all his enemies are put under his feet, and all his friends placed with him upon his throne.—The way to be truly great is to be really useful; and to give the use and glory of all our talents and services to the Lord: and if we be, at length, preserved from the destruction of the wicked, we shall perceive that the Lord has saved us with a great deliverance. May he teach us to repress all our earthly desires, to govern our appetites, to acknowledge candidly our mistakes, and completely to rectify them when discovered; and to be gentle and tender to others, and only severe against our own sins. Attached to the person and cause, and obedient to the orders of our King and Captain, may we endure hardship, be valiant for the truth, and so "fight the good fight of faith, that we may lay hold on eternal life;" and have our names enrolled with honor in the records of the heavenly Jerusalem!

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 1, 2. The sacred writer here goes back in the history, to the times which preceded the death of Saul, and records some particulars not mentioned in the books of Samuel, respecting David's advancement to the throne.—Several considerable persons resorted to him at Ziklag: (Marg. Ref. a, b.) and either joined his small troop, or assured him of assistance when it became necessary.—Some of these were Benjamites, and related to Saul, who were either induced through a firm belief of the word of God by Samuel respecting him; or by indignation at the base treatment which David met with from Saul, to the disgrace of their family and tribe; or because they perceived, that the Lord was departed from Saul, and was with David of a truth. The hand of God was, however, very conspicuous, in raising him up friends from this tribe, whence he might have expected the most determined opposition.—Use both, &c. (2) Notes, Judg. 3:15—18. 20:16.

V. 4. Perhaps Saul had conferred some honorable distinction on thirty of his most valiant captains; as David afterwards did on the same number of his: and Ismaiah was placed over this illustrious company. For Ahiezer, (3) seems to have been the chief of those who came to David at this time.—'I suppose, there were thirty Ben-'jamites came over to David at one time, and this 'was their leader.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 8. Into the hold, &c.] These Gadites came to David, either to Ziklag, or to some of those natural fortresses in which he secured himself, before he went into the land of the Philistines. (Marg. Ref. n.)

Faces of lions, &c.] 'They had a fierceness in 'their countenances, which terrified their ene-'mies; who durst not look them in the face, but 'ran away as soon as they saw them. But they 'could not save themselves by flight, being pur-'sued so swiftly by these men, that they overtook 'them and slew them.' Bp. Patrick. (Marg. Ref. p, q.)

over an hundred, and the greatest over a thousand.

15 These are they that went over Jordan in the first month, when [r] it had [*] overflowed all his banks; and they put to flight all them of the valleys, both toward the east, and toward the west.

16 And there came of [s] the children of Benjamin and Judah to [t] the hold unto David.

17 And David went out [†] to meet them, and answered and said unto them, [u] If ye be come peaceably unto me to help me, [x] mine heart shall be [‡] knit unto you: but if ye be come to betray me to mine enemies, seeing there is no [§] wrong in mine hands, [y] the God of our fathers look thereon, and [z] rebuke it.

18 Then [a] the Spirit [||] came upon [b] Amasai, who was chief of the captains, and he said, [c] Thine are we, David, [d] and on thy side, thou son of Jesse: [e] peace, peace be unto thee, and peace be to thine helpers; for [f] thy God helpeth thee. Then David received them, and made them [g] captains of the band.

V. 14. Either these persons had the command, some over a hundred men, and others over a thousand, before they came to David; or he preferred them afterwards, in consideration of their services; or the passage may be understood according to the marginal reading.

V. 15. The lot of Gad was to the east of Jordan: and it is probable, that these men crossed the river towards the west, or into the land of Canaan properly so called. (Notes. Num. 32:) It seems also, that some great emergency required their immediate interposition; but it is not stated what enemies they opposed.—Perhaps, during some part of Saul's reign, the Philistines and other tribes, made incursions into the land of Israel; and these resolute Gadites hastened to assist their brethren. Or perhaps they were coming to join David, in his extreme danger; and, being opposed by Saul's adherents, they put them to flight, and pursued them in every direction. (Note, 8.)

V. 16—18. David had experienced much treachery even from those of his own tribe, and was therefore put on his guard: but he very frankly avowed his suspicions, and appealed to the consciences of those concerned. If they came peaceably to assist him, he would cordially unite with them; and the time would come, when he should be able to recompense them: but, as he was conscious, he had not injured either Saul or his country; he reminded them, that if they came to betray him, the God of their fathers would surely avenge his cause upon them. Then Amasai, their leader, animated by a special impulse of the Spirit of God, answered him in the name of all the rest. He declared that they were entirely attached to his person and interest; and cordially desired the prosperity of him, and of all who helped him; not only as his cause was just, but as they were persuaded that it was the cause of God, and would prevail: and they desired to share the conflicts and the successes of David and his friends. Accordingly David received and preferred them.—It is not certain, whether Amasai was, or was not, the same as Amasa, elsewhere mentioned. (Marg. Ref. b.)

V. 19. Notes, 1 Sam. 29:2—6.

V. 20, 21. These captains of Manasseh seem to have met David, as he was returning from the army of the Philistines to Ziklag. It is probable, that they did not bring their companies with them; yet they both assured him of future assistance, and very seasonably helped him against the Amalekites who had spoiled Ziklag. (Notes, 1 Sam. 30:)

V. 22. Such numbers resorted to David, after Saul's defeat and death, and they were so loyally attached to David, so united with each other, and so powerfully illustrious and valiant, that they resembled "the host of God;" that is, his legions of angels. Some consider it merely as a Hebraism for a very great army.

V. 23—40. Some learned men understand this passage, or at least a part of it, as relating to the time when David was made king over Judah, on his first coming to Hebron: but it seems entirely to refer to his being made king over all Israel, after the death of Ish-bosheth; for there was no such union of the several tribes, on the former occasion, as is here described. (Notes, 2 Sam. 2:1—4. 5:1—3.)—At that time great numbers came to David from each of the tribes of Israel: but in different proportions, according to the degree of the cordiality and zeal of each tribe. It is probable, that so small a number of Judah was present, in order that David's own tribe, over which he had now reigned seven years, might not appear to impose a king on their brethren. There was a considerable number of Levites assembled; but not at all in proportion to the multitude of the priests, the descendants of Aaron, who appeared on this occasion under a leader named Jehoiada, probably appointed by Abiathar the high priest: while Zadok, who was afterwards high priest, being now a young man, headed a company of chief men, perhaps of the line of Eleazar. So greatly had that family increased, notwithstanding the slaughter which Saul had not long before made of them, (Notes, 1 Sam. 20:6—19.) that almost four thousand attended on this occasion!—The Benjamites in general had favored the house of Saul; and numbers of them still waited for an opportunity of reviving the claim of that family, in some of its branches; for so the latter part of the twenty-ninth verse may be interpreted.—The leaders of Issachar were intelligent men, who understood the signs of the times; and perceived that it was both the duty and political interests of Israel, to advance David to the throne: and, having great authority in their tribe, they induced them to a unanimous concurrence in this measure; though they do not seem to have brought them to Hebron. Besides the numbers, who doubtless on various accounts were kept away, though cordially attached to David, there were three hundred and fifty thousand armed men, all heartily devoted to his service; who placed him upon the throne of Israel, with every expression of joy and affection.

Not of double heart. (33) 'All sincerely affected 'to David; though there were so many of them.' Bp. Patrick. (Note, Jam. 1:5—8.)—On asses, &c. CHAP. XIII.

David, with the princes and people, with great solemnity and zeal, fetches the ark from Kirjath-jearim, 1—8. Uzza is smitten, David is disconcerted, and the ark is left at the house of Obed-edom, 9—14.

AND David [a] consulted with the captains of thousands and hundreds, and with every leader.

2 And David said unto all the congregation of Israel, [b] If it seem good unto you, [c] and that it be of the LORD our God, let us * send abroad unto our brethren every where, that are [d] left in all the land of Israel, and with them also to [e] the priests and Levites which are in † their cities and suburbs, that they may gather themselves unto us:

3 And let us ‡ bring again [f] the ark of our God to us: for [g] we inquired not at it in the days of Saul.

4 And all the congregation said that they would do so; for [h] the thing was right in the eyes of all the people.

5 ¶ So [i] David gathered all Israel together, from [k] Shihor of Egypt even unto the entering of [l] Hemath, to bring the ark of God from [m] Kirjath-jearim.

6 And David went up, and all Israel,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—18.

Earthly princes in general honor with marked distinction such persons, as have faithfully adhered to them in seasons of difficulty and danger: and, in like manner, Jesus Christ will confer peculiar honor upon those, who embrace and adhere to his gospel, in times of persecution and distress; who deny themselves, renounce their worldly interests, break through difficulties, and bear the cross, for his sake and after his example.—Courage, strength, agility, ingenuity, or superior mental endowments, are valuable to the possessors and to the community, only when, being considered as talents committed to them by the great Lord of all, they are conscientiously improved in promoting the glory of God, and the welfare of mankind: for, when misused or neglected, they prove occasions of increasing condemnation.—Long experience of the deceitfulness of mankind will teach caution to every reflecting person; but we should be afraid of growing unreasonably suspicious: and if we have a clear conscience, and use moderate precautions, we may trust in God to defend us from the effects of secret treachery, as well as of open violence; while we should readily forgive former injuries, and unite with those, who profess a disposition to be at peace with us, and to help us. But, when we cannot but suspect men's intentions in courting our friendship, it is best, in some cases, frankly to remonstrate with them as in the sight of God. This may sometimes intimidate the insincere, and give the upright an opportunity of clearing up their characters; while suspicions, harbored in secret, or only whispered among friends, are often injurious to the suspected person, and always troublesome to ourselves. Integrity and affection will frequently, when the case requires it, dictate such frank, unreserved, and energetic language, as to afford full satisfaction: and then, cordial union, in promoting one common cause, succeeds jealousies, distance, and the debility of distrust.—Peace or victory, prosperity and felicity, are ensured to those whom God helps, and to all who concur with them. If under the influence of his Spirit, we, on that account, desire to have our lot among them, and declare on their side; and if we uprightly embrace the cause of Christ; his heart will be knit unto us, and he will receive and advance us in due season.

V. 19—40.

The cause of our King appears to a carnal eye weak and obscure, and his subjects have been hitherto comparatively few: but his kingdom and glory will, ere long, rapidly advance; and his host become, like "the host of God," innumerable and invincible.—The advancement of wise and good men to authority, is justly considered as a cause of great and general joy; and joy naturally enlarges the heart in cheerful liberality. Thus the Savior's exaltation to the throne of glory filled the hearts of his people with gladness: nay, the sinner's willing submission to him, ushers in a day of joy and gladness, in which his brethren share, and to which they contribute. But, what a joyful time will that be, "when all kings shall fall down before him, all nations shall serve him!" Every individual, in the innumerable throng, will participate and add to the joy of all the rest: and nothing short of the perfect purity and harmony of heaven, can give us a higher idea of true happiness. Meanwhile, happy are they, "who have understanding of the times, to know what Israel ought to do:" who wisely perceive it to be their duty and interest, to submit to and trust in Jesus Christ the Son of David: who renounce all inconsistent connexions, pursuits, and employments for his sake; and unreservedly employ all their influence and ability to promote his cause, from love to him and to their brethren: whose love also abounds in knowledge and in all judgment, so that their beneficent endeavors are directed by heavenly wisdom, through an acquaintance with the word of God, and a maturity of experience and observation: and who consequently know how to attempt every thing in that manner, and at those seasons, which are suited to give it the greatest effect. This is to unite "the wisdom of the serpent with the harmlessness of the dove;" and "if any man lack this wisdom, let him ask it of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him."

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1—4. It is probable, that David consulted with his principal friends and officers, about bringing back the ark, immediately after he had got possession of mount Zion, and had fixed his residence there: yet it appears, from comparing the different parts of the narrative, that he did not accomplish the design till some time after, being retarded by the incursions of the Philistines, and by other hindrances. (Notes, 2 Sam. 5: 6:1,2.)—He did not judge it expedient, to act merely by authority, in so important a concern: but, by consulting his friends, he ensured their ready concurrence, and that of their several connexions, and also of the priests and Levites.—During Saul's reign, or the latter part of it at least, the ark had been neglected, and even David had inquired of God by the high priest at to [n] Baalah, that is, to Kirjath-jearim, which belonged to Judah, to bring up thence the ark of God the LORD, [o] that dwelleth between the cherubims, [p] whose name is called on it.

7 And they * carried the ark of God, [q] in a new cart, [r] out of the house of Abinadab; and Uzza and Ahio drave the cart. [Practical Observations.]

8 And [s] David and all Israel played before God with all their might, and with † singing, and [t] with harps, and with psalteries, and with timbrels, and with cymbals, and with trumpets.

9 And when they came unto the threshing-floor of [u] Chidon, Uzza put forth his hand to hold the ark; for the oxen ‡ stumbled.

10 And the anger of the LORD was kindled against Uzza, and he smote him, because [x] he put his hand to the ark: and [y] there he died before God.

11 And David was [z] displeased, because the LORD had made a breach upon Uzza: wherefore that place is called § Perez-uzza [a] to this day.

12 And David was [b] afraid of God that day, saying, [c] How shall I bring the ark of God home to me?

13 So David || brought not the ark home to himself to the city of David, but carried it aside into the house of [d] Obed-edom [e] the Gittite.

14 And the ark of God remained with the family of Obed-edom in his house three months. And [f] the LORD blessed the house of Obed-edom, and all that he had.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

When we set out in life, or obtain any temporal advancement, we should first inquire, how we may honor God and do good, and enjoy the divine blessing, in our several situations, and in the use of our possessions! Princes especially ought to adopt the most useful measures which they can devise to promote true religion by their example and authority, that they may have the Lord nigh unto them in all they undertake. This can only be done by consulting with others, and engaging them to concur in measures of acknowledged utility, and evidently consistent with the word of God; and by reminding, encouraging, and charging the ministers of religion, to attend to their important duties in their several situations, that good examples and good instructions may abound throughout the land. When such things, being mildly proposed, seem good to the leading men, we may hope that they are from the Lord, and expect that many other persons, being called upon, will voluntarily assist; and that thus the gospel will excite general attention, without any of the antichristian weapons of compulsion.—In rectifying abuses, it is generally best to shun personal reflections and severe accusations: they appear malevolent, and excite opposition. Suffice it to shew, that things needful have been neglected, and that it is proper for us to attend to them: and, in public transgressions, humility will teach a man to consider himself as in some measure guilty, and more readily to condemn himself than others.—Even good men, in doing their duty, are liable to mistakes, and to act in an improper spirit: and rebukes, though merited and needed, often excite murmurs, discouragements, and hard thoughts of God. May we then, with redoubled diligence, seek to become acquainted with the whole word of God, and to make it "the lantern of our path:" may we walk humbly and circumspectly, avoid rashness and presumption, rejoice in our privileges with trembling, be patient under divine rebukes, persevere in well doing without discouragement, and seek the forgiveness and acceptance of every service, from the mercy of God in Christ Jesus! Thus will the gospel, which is to many "the savor of death," become to us "the savor of life," and the source of all blessings in time and to eternity.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. V. 1—16. (Notes, 3:1—9. 2 Sam. 5:11—25.) The events, recorded in this chapter, are supposed to have taken place, in the order assigned to them in the second book of Samuel; and before David attempted to bring the ark to mount Zion.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord has so arranged matters in his providence, that all have reciprocally need of each other's assistance: thus men learn to feel their own insufficiency, and to unite in society for their common benefit. But, all our advantages are from God, by whatever means or instruments they are derived to us; and we should recollect, that we possess them for the good of others, and especially for the benefit of his people.—To repress that disposition to carnal security and self-indulgence, which gathers strength by prosperity, we must expect successive conflicts and troubles. But, if we inquire of the Lord in all our difficulties, and trust in him simply; if we use the appointed means with diligence, and obey his orders without reserve; if we break every league with sin, give no quarter to our lusts, and neither spare our own idols, nor covet those of others; and if we be disposed to give all the glory to the Lord; we shall not only be conquerors, but every conflict will increase our felicity, and add lustre to our eternal triumphs. Yet, all the praise and honor will ultimately be ascribed to the Savior: his kingdom is confirmed and made very high, for the benefit of all his believing people: may his fame go forth into all lands; and may all nations fear his indignation, trust his mercy, submit to his authority, and unite in glorifying his name!

NOTES.

CHAP. XV. V. 1. As David had many wives and children, he had occasion to build several houses for them. (3:1—9. 2 Sam. 13:7,20,23. 14:24.)—Some think that the tabernacle made by Moses was become ruinous from time and neglect. About four hundred and fifty years had passed since it was erected. (Notes, 16:37—43. 1 Kings 6:1. 8:4.)

[c] them hath the LORD chosen to carry the ark of God, and [d] to minister unto him for ever.

3 And David [e] gathered all Israel together to Jerusalem, [f] to bring up the ark of the LORD unto his place, which he had prepared for it.

4 And David assembled [g] the children of Aaron, and the Levites:

5 Of the sons of Kohath; [h] Uriel the chief, and his *brethren an hundred and twenty.

6 Of the sons of [i] Merari; Asaiah the chief, and his brethren two hundred and twenty:

7 Of the sons of Gershom; [k] Joel the chief, and his brethren an hundred and thirty:

8 Of the sons of [l] Elizaphan; [m] Shemaiah the chief, and his brethren two hundred:

9 Of the sons of [n] Hebron; Eliel the chief, and his brethren fourscore:

10 Of the sons of [o] Uzziel; [p] Amminadab the chief, and his brethren an hundred and twelve.

11 And David called for [q] Zadok and Abiathar the priests, and for the Levites, for [r] Uriel, Asaiah, and Joel, Shemaiah, and Eliel, and Amminadab, 12 And said unto them, [s] Ye are the chief of the fathers of the Levites: [t] sanctify yourselves, both ye and your brethren, that ye may bring up the ark of the LORD God of Israel unto the place that I have prepared for it.

13 For because [u] ye did it not at the first, [v] the LORD our God made a breach upon us, [x] for that we sought him not after the due order.

14 So the priests and the Levites [y] sanctified themselves, to bring up the ark of the LORD God of Israel.

15 And the children of the Levites [z] bare the ark of God upon their shoulders with the staves thereon, as Moses commanded, according to the word of the LORD.

16 And [a] David spake to the [b] chief of the Levites to appoint their brethren to be [c] the singers with the instruments of music, psalteries, and harps, and cymbals, sounding, by [d] lifting up the voice with joy.

17 So the Levites appointed [e] Heman the son of Joel; and of his brethren, [f] Asaph the son of Berechiah; and of the sons of Merari their brethren, [g] Ethan the son of Kushaiah;

18 And with them their brethren of [h] the second degree, [i] Zechariah, Ben, and [k] Jaaziel, and Shemiramoth, and Jehiel, and Unni, Eliab, and Benaiah, and Maaseiah, and Mattithiah, and Elipheleh,

V. 2, 3. Marg. Ref.—Notes, 12—15. 2 Sam. 6:12,13.

V. 4—11. The priests and Levites had been before sent to; (13:2.) but it is probable, that only a few of them attended: at least, at this time greater numbers were collected, and they were arranged with more exact regularity. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12—14. It appears from David's language to the priests and Levites, that they had before neglected to "sanctify themselves," by carefully avoiding, or seeking to be cleansed from, all ceremonial pollutions; by abstraction from outward indulgences; and by repentance, faith, prayer, and meditation. (Notes, Ex. 19:10—15. 2 Chr. 29:3—5, v. 5. 30:15.)—The ark had been long stationary, and the priests and Levites, through negligence, had forgotten how it ought to be removed; so that the king himself first discovered the error which had been committed, and pointed it out to them: and though he joined himself with them, as "not having sought the LORD after the due order;" (13:9—11. Notes, 2 Sam. 6:3—11. 2 Chr. 30:16—20.) yet it is plain that a large proportion of the blame belonged to them, especially to the chief persons among them. (Note, Mal. 2:4—9.) It seems, however, that they were at this time made sensible of their guilt and danger; and very seriously and reverentially prepared for the solemn service. 'This good 'king doth not wholly excuse himself, and lay 'all the blame on them; but puts himself into 'the number of those who were negligent in this 'matter. For it was his duty, as well as theirs, 'to look into the law, and pray to God for his di'rection.' Bp. Patrick. Had the express injunction in the law of Moses (Note, Deut. 17:18.) been strictly observed, it would have prevented many of these mistakes. But it may be doubted, if even David himself had noticed it.

V. 15. The Levites of the family of Kohath were appointed to carry the ark, and the priests were of that family; so that, on some occasions the priests, and on others the ordinary Levites descended from Kohath, performed this service. (Notes, Num. 4:4—16. 7:4—9. Josh. 3:3,4. 1 Kings 8:3.)

V. 16. David, as a prophet, appointed the several particulars concerning the solemn worship at the sanctuary, especially in respect of psalmody and music: and he seems first to have begun this arrangement when he removed the and Mikneiah, [l] and Obed-edom, and Jeiel, the porters.

19 So the singers, Heman, Asaph, and Ethan, were appointed to sound with [m] cymbals of brass;

20 And Zechariah, and [n] Aziel, and Shemiramoth, and Jehiel, and Unni, and Eliab, and Maaseiah, and Benaiah, with psalteries on [o] Alamoth;

21 And [p] Mattithiah, and Elipheleh, and Mikneiah, and Obed-edom, and Jeiel, and Azaziah, with [q] harps on the * Sheminith to excel.

22 And Chenaniah, chief of the Levites, was † for ‡ song: [r] he instructed about the song, because he was skilful.

23 And Berechiah and Elkanah were [s] door-keepers for the ark.

24 And Shebaniah, and Jehoshaphat, and Nethaneel, and Amasai, and Zechariah, and Benaiah, and Eliezer, [t] the priests, did blow with the trumpets before the ark of God: and [u] Obed-edom and Jehiah were door-keepers for the ark.

25 ¶ So [x] David and the elders of Israel, and the [y] captains over thousands, went to bring up the ark of the covenant of the LORD out of the house of [z] Obed-edom [a] with joy.

26 And it came to pass, when [b] God helped the Levites that bare the ark of the covenant of the LORD, that [c] they offered [d] seven bullocks and seven rams.

27 And David was clothed with [e] a robe of fine linen, and all the Levites that bare the ark, and the singers, and [f] Chenaniah the master of the § song with the singers: David also had upon him an ephod of linen.

28 Thus all Israel [g] brought up the ark of the covenant of the LORD [h] with shouting, and with sound of the cornet, and with trumpets, and with cymbals, making a noise with psalteries and harps.

29 And it came to pass as the [i] ark of the covenant of the [k] LORD came to the city of David, that [l] Michal the daughter of Saul, looking out at a window, saw king David [m] dancing and playing: and [n] she despised him in her heart.

V. 22. Chenaniah seems to have been the precentor, and the principal instructer of all the company in singing: though Heman, Asaph, and Ethan had the chief authority over the singers and musicians of the families of Levites. (Marg. Ref. v. 17.)

V. 23, 24. Perhaps Berechiah and Elkanah were stationed on mount Zion, to open the doors of the tent, when the ark approached to it; and when the singers called on them for admission. (Note, Ps. 24:7—10.) And Obed-edom and Jehiah were afterwards appointed statedly to guard the door of the tent, that none might enter, but according to the law.—The blowing of the trumpets was exclusively the office of the priests. (Marg. Ref. t. Note, Num. 10:2—10.)

V. 26. The Levites offered these sacrifices on their own account, besides those which David offered. (Note, 2 Sam. 6:12,13.) Thus they acknowledged the unmerited goodness of God, in enabling them with safety to perform the service allotted them; probably being conscious, that Uzzah had been smitten, as much through their fault as for his own.—Some think that they rested seven times, and offered a bullock and a ram each time. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The most zealous and useful reformers have, in all ages, been left to make mistakes, which inferior persons could easily discern; and especially, before their judgments were matured by experience and observation. Satan avails himself of these errors to prejudice the minds of men against their whole character and work: and the artifice readily succeeds with those, who are in quest of some specious pretence, for despising and opposing the humbling truths and the holy service of God. But, we should hence infer, that nothing perfect can be expected from mere men; and we should neither be offended at the miscarriages blended with laudable and useful endeavors, nor yet vindicate or adopt every sentiment and practice, which have been sanctioned by respectable and eminent men: but, we should compare all, as well as we can, with the word of God; and by that criterion distinguish between the precious and the vile. Wise and good men, however, will profit by rebukes; having discovered, they will honestly confess, their mistakes, and acknowledge that they "did not seek the LORD after the due order;" and, upon recollection, they will both justify him in his sharpest corrections, and proceed with their work with greater circumspection. It indeed, seems one of the greatest attainments of human nature, to search out, confess, rectify, and profit by, our own mistakes and miscarriages. —The Lord's choice of us, in every sense in which that expression is used or understood, implies our being chosen to services, as well as privileges: and plain and serious admonitions, from those who lead the way by a good example, and whose rank and character give weight and authority to their words, will often excite the remiss to diligence, and the ignorant and heedless to learn and attend to their duty.—But alas! pre-eminence is generally privileged with supineness and indulgence: and too often, examples of avarice, pride, and licentiousness, become infamously conspicuous, through the rank of those who set them; diffusing their baleful influence, like a destructive pestilence, among the subordinate members of the community. We have all, however, our proper place, work, and talent; every servant should know well his own business, and punctually execute it; and this cannot be done without attention to the Scriptures, and preparation of heart by the sanctification of the Spirit, vouchsafed in answer to our prayers.—Every thing we engage in, must be undertaken in dependence on the mercy and grace of God through the atoning sacrifice of the Redeemer: and, as "it is of the LORD's mercy, that we are not consumed;" so, if we go successfully and comfortably through any service, we must remember that God has helped us, and give him the glory; for without him we can do nothing. When God accepts our persons and our works, makes our hearts joyful in himself, and renders our services beneficial to his church; we may indeed expect, but need not regard, the scoffs and reproaches of unbelievers: and we must learn to bear them with patience, and to persevere in our compassionate prayers for those, who are thus enemies to their own souls by opposing the cause of God, which we are honored to promote.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVI. V. 1—3. Notes, 2 Sam. 6:17—19.

V. 4—6. These Levites were appointed "to record," or to put the people in remembrance of the wonderful works of God for Israel, as well as to thank him and praise his name. (Note, Is. 62:6,7.) Doubtless, David acted as a prophet in regulating this part of divine worship: and his example will not justify uninspired men, in introducing human inventions into the worship of God, and imposing them by their own authority; for when Hezekiah made similar arrangements, he only enforced what David had appointed. (2 Chr. 29:26—28.) Yet it is evident that the other kings of Judah, and Nehemiah after the captivity, in many things commanded and directed the Levites and priests, and even the high priest, in respect of their ministrations; and that when they exercised this authority in religious concerns, according to the word of God, they were approved and commended for so doing. As this is no where enjoined on rulers in the law of Moses; it seems by no means exclusively to belong to that dispensation, but to be the proper improvement of the talents intrusted to them; while an unscriptural exercise of this authority constituted an abuse and perversion of their talents. (Notes, 2 Kings 16:10—16. 2 Chr. 15:12—19. 29:12,15,21—24. 30:12. 31:2—4,20,21. 34:20—28. 35:1—9. Neh. 13:7—13, 28—31. Ez. 45:18—25.)—The use of instrumental music in the worship of God was evidently prior to the ceremonial law; and therefore could form no part of it, or be abrogated with it: and though it is not required in the New Testament; yet, it seems no way inconsistent with it, provided it be suited to the solemnity and seriousness of our religious rejoicing, and so regulated as really to assist the exercise of devout affections. The sad abuse of making, what is called sacred music, a matter of mere carnal diversion, with some other subordinate evils of the same kind, form the strongest arguments against it. (Note, Ex. 15:1.) —The trumpets alone were appointed in the law, and had a typical meaning. (Note, Num. 10:2—10. P. O. 1—10.)

V. 7. The psalm, which was sung on this solemn occasion, is composed of extracts from several psalms. (Marg. Ref.) To the twenty-second verse inclusive is nearly the same as the former part of the cv. Psalm: from the twenty-third verse to the thirty-third, it accords to the xcvi. Psalm; and the conclusion, to that of the cvi. Psalm. Probably David had these by him, with many others, for his own private use; and he composed from them a song of praise and thanksgiving, to record the mercies of the Lord, suited to the solemnity. But, afterwards he gave the other psalms also, one after another, into the hands of the chief singers, for the benefit of the people who attended the worship performed before the ark.

To thank the Lord.] 'To give him thanks, (as 'Conradus Pellicanus well glosses) for all his 'benefits, he had bestowed on his people Israel, 'and which he intended to bestow on all the peo-'ple of this world by his Son Christ.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 8, 9. In these verses the inspired and enraptured Psalmist excited the people, and taught them to animate each other, in blessing the God of Israel for all his mercies, and in celebrating his glorious perfections, which are worthy to be known, admired, and extolled; and which render him the meet object of the universal and entire love, worship, confidence, and obedience of all rational creatures. He also exhorted them to meditate, and converse frequently, on the wonderful works of JEHOVAH, and to proclaim them before others; to call on him in all their wants and dangers; and by every means to adore and praise him. (Notes, Ps. 96:1—4. 105:1,2. Is. 12:4—6.)

V. 10. To "glory in God," is to value our relation to him, as our honor and privilege, far above all other distinctions; to make that alone the ground of our confidence and exultation; to account ourselves in this, more happy, more honored, and more favored, than any other people. To "glory in his holy name," is to rejoice and exult in his immutable wisdom, justice, truth, and love. (Notes, Is. 45:23—25. Jer. 9:23,24. 1 Cor. 1:26—31. Phil. 3:1—7, v. 3.) And even they, who are only beginning to seek the Lord, may rejoice that he is upon a mercy-seat, ready to receive their submissions, to hear their prayers, to forgive their sins, to supply their wants, and to save their souls. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11. "Seeking the LORD" implies an earnest and diligent endeavor to obtain the knowledge and favor of God, according to the revelation made of him in his word; the renewal of the soul to holiness by his grace, the safety to be enjoyed under his omnipotent protection, and the comfort and support of his Spirit under all trials and temptations, till his strength has perfected the work of his mercy in the full salvation of both body and soul; when present glimpses of his glory, and experience of his love, shall be perfected, by beholding the full display of that glory, and enjoying the full effects of that love, in heaven for ever. (Notes, Ps. 14:2,3. 27:8,9. Is. 55:6,7. Matt. 6:33,34. 7:7—11.)—The gracious aid and protection of JEHOVAH were ensured to Israel, when they sought him as dwelling between the cherubim above the ark: therefore the ark itself is called "his strength;" and this implies, that we must "seek the Lord," through Christ, and according to the gospel. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 12, 13. "The judgments of his mouth," may either mean, the righteous laws and statutes given to Israel, or the just vengeance which God denounced and executed on his enemies, in Egypt, in the wilderness, and in Canaan. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Deut 7:6—8. Is. 41. 8,9.)

V. 14. Israel, as the peculiar people of JEHOVAH, were bound to worship and obey him; and ought to glory and rejoice in him. Indeed, his word and his works, both of mercy and vengeance, which had become known and renowned among the nations far and wide, suggested powerful motives both of warning and encouragement, to his professed servants. He also governs the whole earth in justice and in judgment: and is continually executing, in his providence, deserved punishment upon offending nations and individuals. His judgments were made known in all the earth, in a most striking manner, when Christianity was established in the world; while the nation of the Jews, and the idolatrous Gentiles, who opposed the cause of Christ, were exposed to the most terrible and durable calamities.

V. 15—19. (Note, Ps. 105:8—15, v. 8.) The covenant of JEHOVAH with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, engaged to their posterity the inheritance of Canaan. This was absolute, as a law which required prompt obedience. Their descendants must inherit the land; but, which of their generations, or for how long a time that should be, depended on other circumstances, which were declared and stipulated by the Sinai-covenant. (Notes, Gen. 17:4—12. 26:2—5.

Patrick.* A thousand generations is a large definite number taken for an indefinite one; (Deut. 7:9.) and this language was suited to lead the thoughts of pious Israelites, to the eternal inheritance typified by Canaan. The oath, by which the Lord condescended to ratify this engagement, shewed the immutability of his counsel, and represented the covenant of grace, as irreversibly confirmed with every true believer. —David called upon the people to remember this covenant; that, considering from how small beginnings, through how many and formidable difficulties, and after how many delays, the engagement of the Lord had been fulfilled; they might be animated to praise him, encouraged to trust him, and induced to cleave to and obey him.

V. 20—22. (Notes, Gen. 20:1—7. 26:11.) The Patriarchs were the Lord's anointed, as they were believers, prophets, and types and ancestors of Christ; in respect of the Lord's choice of them, his grace bestowed on them, and their spiritual consecration to his service; though they were not externally anointed with oil, that we read of. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1 John 2:20—29.)

V. 23, 24. Having taken a suitable passage from one psalm, to stir up the congregation to celebrate the praises of God, for his special mercies to Israel; David introduces another psalm, and adds a solemn call to all the inhabitants of the earth to join in his praises, as the only living and true God, the Creator and Judge of the world, and the God of salvation; and from day to day to make known his glory and salvation still more widely. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ps. 96:1—4.) 'Let not only the Israelites praise 'him, but all the people of the earth acknowledge their great Creator; proclaim his prom-'ised salvation by Christ without intermission.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 25, 26. The power and majesty, the authority and eternity, the omniscience, omnipresence, and unchangeableness of God, are his greatness: as his justice, wisdom, truth, goodness, and mercy, form his holiness. In both respects he is altogether glorious, and infinitely exceeds the most exalted praises, and even the comprehension, of the noblest of all created intelligences. Thus he is the sole Object of fear, and reverential worship, and adoring love; while all others, to whom divine worship ever was rendered, are either senseless stocks, fallen angels, or mere creatures, who cannot help their worshippers, or punish their despisers. (Notes, Ps. 96:5. Jer. 10:6—8,11—15. Rev. 15:1—4.)

V. 27. (Ps. 96:6.) Wherever the Lord displays his presence by his works, he shews the glory and honor of his perfections: but, in heaven, where his presence is manifested, in a manner to us inconceivable and ineffable, his glory and honor beam forth upon the blessed inhabitants, so as to transform them fully into his holy image of light, purity, and felicity, and to be reflected back in their rapturous unceasing worship and service of him. This is, in a feeble way, imitated and emulated, "in his place," his sanctuary, his church on earth. There his power and beauty are in a measure displayed; and the true believer, beholding in Christ Jesus the glory of the Lord, "is changed into the same image, from glory to glory, by the Spirit of the Lord;" and thus is both made meet for the inheritance of the saints in light, and enjoys the earnests of it. (Notes, Ps. 27:4—6. 50:1,2. 63:1—4. 2 Cor. 3:17,18.)

V. 28, 29. This is an exhortation to all who then heard, and all who now hear or read it, to "ascribe to JEHOVAH" the tribute of praise and adoration, which he demands as his due; to allow that all glory belongs to him, and that all power resides in him, or is derived from him: and to render to him that gratitude, love, and service, which is due to him from all, as their Creator and hourly Benefactor. (Notes, Ps. 29 1,2. 96:7—9.) This cannot be withheld without the basest ingratitude.—"All the kindreds of the earth" form but one family, and ought to unite in the service of their common Father. But all had sinned, and fallen under condemnation: yet, through the Redeemer, who was promised from the beginning, all were invited to approach the Lord with their worship and oblations at his sanctuary. This may be called, "the beauty of holiness," from the especial presence of the Lord, dwelling above the ark between the cherubim, upon the mercy-seat, as Israel's God; a the world also shall be [p] stable, that it be not moved.

31 Let [q] the heavens be glad, and [r] let the earth rejoice: and let men say among the nations, [s] The LORD reigneth.

33 Then shall [x] the trees of the wood sing out at the presence of the LORD, [y] because he cometh to judge the earth.

34 O [z] give thanks unto the LORD; for he is good; for his mercy endureth for ever.

typifying the human nature of Jesus Christ; and representing the believer's heart, now become "an habitation of God through the Spirit." When, however, we approach the Father, upon a mercy-seat, through the sacrifice and mediation of the Son, and under the influences of the Holy Spirit; then, and then only, do we, in the full meaning of the words, "worship the LORD in the beauty of holiness."

V. 30. Let all men fear the power, justice, and majesty of God: let them fear his wrath, and flee for refuge to his mercy; let them reverence his authority and excellency, and learn to worship and obey him. (Notes, Gen. 22:11, 12. 1 Kings 8:41—43.) If this were done, it would render the moral state of the world as stable and immoveable, and keep every thing in as great order and regularity, as his creating and upholding word has established the natural state of it: and to this the gospel is suited to bring all who embrace it. (Note, Ps. 75:2,3. 96:10.)

V. 31. Wise, righteous, and good kings, and equitable laws, impartially administered, make prosperous nations; and all good subjects must rejoice in a government of this description: but traitors and criminals tremble on that very account. The Lord, who reigns over all, is perfect in his character, his law, and his administration: this alone would be cause of universal joy, if all men were loyal and obedient; but it speaks terror to the sinner's conscience. Yet, as the Lord reigneth in Jesus Christ upon a throne of grace; even sinners, yea, the chief of sinners, may rejoice, when, desirous of forgiveness and reconciliation, they are made humbly willing to become his subjects: so that men, of all nations on earth, are called on to join the gladness of the blessed inhabitants of heaven; and in exulting joy to proclaim, that "the LORD God omnipotent reigneth." (Notes, Ps. 97:1,2. 99:1—3.)

V. 32, 33. All the parts of nature are here poetically addressed, by the royal prophet, to join the universal song of joy and praise; in their several ways, to welcome JEHOVAH as the Sovereign of the universe; and to wait the great decisive day, when he will come, as the Savior of his people, to judge the world in righteousness. (Notes, Ps. 96:11—13. 98:7—9. 148: Is. 55:12, 13.) Perhaps all the different ranks and descriptions of the human species, who have feared the Lord, and hoped in his mercy, and who will then unanimously rejoice in the consummation of their felicity, are here intended under figurative expressions. The first coming of Christ likewise, with the calling of the gentiles, and the surprising and most happy change effected by the gospel, in the moral and religious state of the world, as preparatory to his second coming, seems also to have been predicted.—Indeed, nothing but the plenteous goodness of God, the perpetuity and eternity of his mercy in Christ Jesus, can encourage a sinner to desire his appearing as a Judge: all therefore except true believers must tremble at the thoughts of that solemn season, in proportion as they understand the nature of that judgment, and attentively meditate upon it: and they will be driven to desperation when it shall arrive.

V. 34—36. (Notes, Ps. 136:1—3. Jer. 33:10, 11.) Many Israelites, even when David came to the throne, might be dispersed in other nations, by the frequent wars waged with their neighbors. And he prayed that they might be gathered from their dispersions, to join in this joyful worship. (Notes, Ps. 14:7. 106:47,48.) Perhaps the Spirit of God, who spake by the Psalmist, intended the gathering of Israel from future and greater dispersions: and it may well be accommodated to the present state of that nation, and our hope of their future calling into the church; as well as to the collecting together of believers from all the nations of the earth, to bless and adore the God of Israel, in and through the Lord Jesus Christ.—We can scarcely enlarge our thoughts to conceive the effect, which these high praises of God, sung by so vast a multitude, with harmonious elevation of heart and voice, upon this joyful occasion, must have produced. It naturally leads our thoughts to the songs of the redeemed of the Lord in glory: and perhaps we are not, in this world, capable of more just and spiritual ideas of them, than are suggested by this subject, though we may be sure do according to all that is written in the law of the LORD, which he commanded Israel;

41 And with them [o] Heman and Jeduthun, and the rest that were chosen, who were [p] expressed by name, [q] to give thanks to the LORD, because his mercy endureth for ever;

42 And with them Heman and Jeduthun with [r] trumpets and cymbals, for those that should make a sound, and with [s] musical instruments of God. And the sons of Jeduthun were * porters.

that they are unspeakably more sublime and refined. (Notes, Ps. 41:11—13, v. 13. 89:52.)

V. 37—43. Abiathar was high priest at this time; and it is probable he resided at Jerusalem. 'Abiathar the high priest attended upon David, 'that if he had any occasion to consult the divine 'majesty, ... he might be ready to do it for him.' Bp. Patrick.—The stated worship before the ark consisted principally of psalmody and music, over which Asaph presided. But Zadok, of Eleazar's line, as next in authority under the high priest, resided at Gibeon, where the tabernacle and the brazen altar still remained; (Note, 2 Sam. 6:17.) and there, with the other priests, he took care that all the sacrifices prescribed by the law should be regularly offered.—Psalmody was constantly performed here also, under the direction of Heman and Jeduthun: and they had with them the sacred trumpets, which seem to have been kept by them, though used by none but the priests.—When David brought the ark from obscurity, he was directed to convey it to Jerusalem, because it was to be stationed there. As he intended immediately to build a temple for its reception, he did not remove the tabernacle of Moses thither; but prepared a temporary tent, perhaps formed in the same manner: and when he was not allowed to build the temple, he made no alteration, but attended to both separately all his days. It seems that these regulations were made and declared, before the people separated, and were continued from that very day. (Notes, 2 Sam. 6:20. 1 Kings 3:4.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

The public revival of religion, and the pure worship of God, being countenanced and protected by "the powers that be," are joyful events to believers: and when their hearts are enlarged with gratitude to God, they will also be expanded in liberality towards men, and disposed to pray for them, and to do good to them for his sake.—It is a good and pleasant thing to be thankful, and we should carefully record and frequently review the Lord's mercies, to us and to his church, that we may be excited to abound in joyful praises: and ministers are especially appointed, by the Son of David our King, to animate and assist the people thus to glorify and rejoice in God, by preaching to them the gospel of salvation, and by every other means in their power.—The streams of mercy, of which we partake, should be traced back to that Fountain of love whence they are derived; and, in thanking the Lord for his benefits to us, we should celebrate the glorious excellences of his nature. This will also encourage our own faith and hope, and excite the attention of others to observe and admire his marvellous works: therefore we should be unreserved and open, in singing and speaking forth the praises of our God.—Riches, pre-eminence, wisdom, and strength, are precarious blessings, in which we must not glory and rejoice: but "let him that glorieth, glory" in his relation to "the Lord" our Salvation. To know, love, and belong to him constitutes the chief honor and happiness of man; and forms "that good part which shall never be taken from us." While the assured believer boldly glories in the righteousness, mercy, truth, and power of his reconciled God, let the trembling sinner rejoice also; for he casts out none that come, and saves all who trust in him. But, let us all learn to seek him diligently and continually: not only that we may rejoice in his favor; but that we may be strengthened by him, to perform every service, and to triumph over all our inward and outward enemies. Indeed, we could no longer distrust either his mercy, or his power, if we duly remembered his works of old; especially the marvellous work of redemption, through Jesus Christ, which has eclipsed all former displays of his wisdom, truth, and love. Nor are "the judgments of his mouth" less worthy of our attention, than "the operations of his hands:" by them we are instructed and directed; and even the denunciations of his wrath, and the execution of his righteous vengeance on sinners, "warn us to flee from the wrath to come," and to "give diligence to make our calling and election sure:" whilst his mercies are recorded, to enliven our gratitude and encourage our hope; as the happy and chosen servants of God, who are "followers of them, who through faith and patience inherit the promises." (Notes and P. O. Heb. 6:13—20.)

V. 14—29.

The all-sufficient God is the Portion and the everlasting recompense of his true people; while his worship and service form the solace of their souls in this evil world. "He is ever mindful of his covenant," and he makes it a law to himself, an invariable rule of his conduct towards them: and if we were duly mindful of it, we should derive great encouragement from his promises, and from that oath which he has interposed for the "strong consolation of all those, who have fled for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before them:" while love and gratitude would, as an inward law in our minds, command and constrain our most devoted obedience.—Those who are interested in his promise of eternal life, by faith in Jesus Christ, will be carried through all difficulties, and rendered superior in all conflicts, though in themselves they are few and poor. Here, they wander as strangers and pilgrims: but, compared with them, the most potent monarchs are accounted mean and vile, in the judgment of God. They have received the unction of his Holy Spirit; his seal is affixed to them, and no man can injure them with impunity: nay, nothing can possibly harm them, but all things shall eventually work together for their good. (Notes and P. O. Rom. 8:28—39.) Let us, however, be careful of prematurely concluding, that we are numbered with them; and seriously appeal to our consciences and experience, whether "the Lord of the whole earth" be that Lord, whom we desire to obey: and whether salvation by Jesus Christ from deserved wrath, from Satan, sin, and this present evil world, be our daily prayer, hope, and rejoicing. Do we perceive and adore the glory of the divine perfections, and rejoice in celebrating his praise? And do we yield ourselves to his service; depending on his mercy

CHAP. XVII.

David, purposing to build a temple, is encouraged by Nathan, 1, 2. The Lord afterwards, by Nathan, prohibits it; but with many encouraging promises, 3—15. David's prayer and thanksgiving, 16—27.

NOW it came to pass, [a] as David sat in his house, that David said to [b] Nathan the prophet, Lo, [c] I dwell in an house of cedars, but [d] the ark of the covenant of the LORD remaineth [e] under curtains.

2 Then Nathan said unto David, [f] Do all that is in thine heart: [g] for God is with thee.

3 And it came to pass the same night, that [h] the word of God came to Nathan, saying,

4 Go and [i] tell David my servant, Thus saith the LORD, [j] Thou shalt not build me an house to dwell in:

5 For I have not [k] dwelt in an house since the day that I brought up Israel, unto this day; but have * gone [l] from tent to tent, and from one tabernacle to another.

6 Wheresoever I have [m] walked with all Israel, spake I a word to any of [n] the judges of Israel, whom I commanded to [o] feed my people, saying, [p] Why have ye not built me an house of cedars?

7 Now therefore thus shalt thou say unto my servant David, Thus saith the LORD of hosts, [p] I took thee from the sheep-cote, even † from following the sheep, that thou shouldest be [q] ruler over my people Israel:

8 And [r] I have been with thee whithersoever thou hast walked, and [s] have cut off all thine enemies from before thee, and have [t] made thee a name like the name of the great men that are in the earth.

9 Also [u] I will ordain a place for my people Israel, and will [x] plant them, and they shall dwell in their place, [y] and shall be moved no more; neither shall [z] the children of wickedness [a] waste them any more, [b] as at the beginning,

10 And [c] since the time that I commanded judges to be over my people Israel. [d] Moreover I will subdue all thine enemies.

and grace, and lamenting that we love him no more and serve him no better? All this, and immensely more, is due to him: for he is infinitely great, holy, and good; all our praises are beneath his excellency; and nothing can be compared with his uncreated majesty. Let us then devote all we have and are to him, and aim to worship him "in the beauty of holiness."

V. 30—43.

The LORD our God is greatly to be feared. All the earth should stand in awe of him: for his wrath against the workers of iniquity is intolerable and eternal; but "in his favor there is life, in his presence there is fulness of joy, and at his right hand there are pleasures for evermore." He is glorious as our Creator and Judge, but more glorious as a Savior: in that character sinners may approach and worship him, with acceptance and comfort; and men on earth, as well as the holy inhabitants of heaven, may rejoice in his universal and everlasting kingdom; because in Christ Jesus, "he is good, and his mercy endureth for ever." Oh, that there were such a heart in us and in all men, thus to fear him and to hope in his mercy; that we might look forward with comfort and exultation to our meeting him upon his awful judgment seat! He is continually collecting, before his throne, that chosen remnant, which the Savior has redeemed unto God with his blood, from all the nations of the earth: and there, being freed from sin, admitted to the beatific vision, and filled with love, and gratitude, and joy, they sing eternal praises to his name. As we successively depart this life, may our souls be gathered unto them: and may that time speedily arrive, when the scattered Jews shall at length be gathered into the church, and the fulness of the Gentiles brought in, to "give thanks to his holy name, and to glory in his praise!" Amen, and Amen.—In this life believers enjoy, from time to time, earnests and foretastes of heavenly bliss; but, when they cannot reach such fervent affections and exalted strains, they must statedly persevere in using the means of grace, as sinners "beholding the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world:" and the continual attendance of his appointed ministers, in his courts, is not only right in itself, but an encouragement to the faith and hope of his people, and a help to their praises and thanksgivings. Finally, it is well, when one duty prepares the soul for another; when public worship renders us more constant and spiritual in family-worship and secret devotion; and when the effects of the whole appear in our conduct in relative life and in society.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVII. V. 1—6. This chapter almost entirely answers to the seventh of the second of Samuel: many minute variations indeed are found; but those only which are more material need here be noticed. (Notes, 2 Sam. 7:1—7.) Tent to tent, &c. (5) In the wilderness, the ark was taken out of the tent, when the camp of Israel marched; and was returned into it, when they rested.—It was afterwards taken from the tabernacle at Shiloh, and then stationed at Kirjath-jearim, doubtless in a tent prepared for it; thence David removed it to another tent on mount Zion. (16:1—3. Notes, 1 Sam. 7:1,2. 21:1,2. 2 Sam. 6:10, 11,17.)

Furthermore I tell thee, that [e] the LORD will build thee an house.

11 And it shall come to pass, [f] when thy days be expired, that thou must [g] go to be with thy fathers, that [h] I will raise up thy seed after thee, which shall be of thy sons; and I will establish his kingdom.

12 [i] He shall build me an house, and [k] I will establish his throne for ever.

13 [l] I will be his Father, and he shall be [m] my son: and [n] I will not take my mercy away from him, [o] as I took it from him that was before thee:

14 But I will settle him [p] in mine house, and in my kingdom for ever: and his throne shall be established for evermore.

15 [q] According to all these words, and according to all this vision, so did Nathan speak unto David.

16 ¶ And David the king came and [r] sat before the LORD, and said, [s] Who am I, O LORD God, and [t] what is mine house, [u] that thou hast brought me hitherto?

17 And yet this was [x] a small thing in thine eyes, O God; for [y] thou hast also spoken of thy servant's house for a great while to come, and [z] hast regarded me according to the estate of a man of high degree, O LORD God.

18 What can David speak more to thee for [a] the honor of thy servant? for [b] thou knowest thy servant.

22 For [n] thy people Israel didst thou make thine own people for ever; and thou, LORD, becamest their God.

23 Therefore now, LORD, [o] let the thing that thou hast spoken concerning thy servant, and concerning his house, be established for ever, and do as thou hast said.

24 Let it even be established, [p] that thy name may be magnified for ever, saying, The LORD of hosts is the God of Israel, even [q] a God to Israel: and let the house of David thy servant be established before thee.

Patrick.*

V. 16, 17. (Notes, 2 Sam. 7:18,19.) Thou hast, &c. (17) In the parallel passage we read, "Is this the manner of men, O LORD God?" It was not the manner of men to raise a poor shepherd to be a renowned and powerful king. Some expositors, however, suppose, that David here referred to the Messiah himself, the Seed of the woman, the greatest of the human race, being also "the Lord from heaven;" in whose line God had placed David as the progenitor, and had honored him as the type of his anointed King. "Thou hast looked upon me according to the manner of the Man who is of high degree, O LORD God." (Notes, 2 Sam. 7:19. Ps. 110:1. 1 Cor. 15:45—49. Phil. 2:5—11.)

'He 'had passed his word to David by his prophets out 'of his own mere goodness, without any other motive. CHAP. XVIII.

David subdues the Philistines, and makes the Moabites tributary, 1, 2. He smites Hadarezer and the Syrians, 3—8. Tou, king of Hamath, sends his son to David with presents, which he dedicates, with the spoil, unto God, 9—11. He puts garrisons into Edom, 12, 13. He reigns in equity, 14. His principal officers, 15—17.

NOW [a] after this it came to pass, that David smote the Philistines, and subdued them, and took [b] Gath and her towns out of the hand of the Philistines.

2 And [c] he smote Moab; and the Moabites became David's servants, and [d] brought gifts.

3 And David smote [e] Hadarezer king of [f] Zobah unto Hamath, as he went to stablish his dominion [g] by the river Euphrates.

4 And David took from him a thousand chariots, and [h] seven thousand horsemen, and twenty thousand footmen: David also [i] houghed all the chariot-horses, but reserved of them [k] an hundred chariots.

5 And when [l] the Syrians of * Damascus came [m] to help Hadarezer king o [n] Zobah, David slew of the Syrians two and twenty thousand men.

6 Then David put garrisons in Syria-damascus; and the Syrians [o] became David's servants, and brought gifts. [p] Thus the LORD preserved David whithersoever he went.

7 And David took the [q] shields of gold that were on the servants of Hadarezer, and brought them to Jerusalem.

8 Likewise from [r] Tibhath, and from Chun, cities of Hadarezer, brought David very much brass [s] wherewith Solomon made the brazen sea, and the pillars, and the vessels of brass.

9 ¶ Now when [t] Tou king of Hamath heard how David had smitten all the host of Hadarezer king of Zobah;

10 He sent † Hadoram his son to king David, to ‡ inquire of his welfare, and to § congratulate him, because he had fought against Hadarezer, and smitten him; (for Hadarezer ‖ had war with Tou;) and with

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The repetitions in the word of God may be considered, as tacit reproofs of our negligence, forgetfulness, and unteachableness. Indeed, we are very backward to get familiarly acquainted with every part of the sacred volume, and very prone to forget what we have read; so that we need to be taught again what we seem to have already learned: and for all these reasons it is very useful to have the same important truths, precepts, and examples enforced on us, in different parts of the scriptures. If, in reading any chapter, or hearing any sermon, we learn nothing new; yet, are reminded of those things of which we had lost sight, and stirred up to the exercise of faith and holy affections, and to the more diligent, fervent, and delightful practice of our several duties; very important purposes are answered. (Note, 2 Pet. 1:12—15. P. O. 12—18. Note, 3:1—4.) It may, however, suffice to observe in this place, that persons of eminent piety will still be devising, and attempting, one service after another for the honor of God, and to promote the best interests of mankind; accounting themselves to have done nothing, while so much remains to be done: that Christ alone begins and finishes his work, and perpetually unites in his own person all those offices, which are requisite for the welfare of his church; but that mere men have, for a short space, certain portions of service allotted them, which they cannot exceed: that God accepts and rewards those good desires, which he is pleased for wise reasons to frustrate: that his favor and his image ennoble the meanest of his people, above "the estate of men of high degree:" that we cannot possibly desire more for ourselves, or for the church, than he has promised: that true grace desires all this, and wants no more; and true faith, in vigorous exercise, seeks, asks, expects, and waits for it all, in the way which God has prescribed: and that, if we serve the Lord, as a God over us in dependence on his mercy through Jesus Christ he will be a God to us; and those whom he blesses, will be blessed for evermore. For this blessedness may we look, with patient submission and joyful expectation, amidst the trials of life, and in the hour of death; and may the same be continued to our children and posterity after us through successive generations!

NOW it came to pass after this, that [a] Nahash the king of the children of Ammon died, and his son reigned in his stead.

2 And David said, [b] I will shew kindness unto Hanun the son of Nahash, because his father shewed kindness to me. And David sent messengers to comfort him concerning his father. So the servants of David came into the land of [c] the children of Ammon, to Hanun, to comfort him.

4 Wherefore Hanun [g] took David's servants, and [h] shaved them, [i] and cut off their garments in the midst, hard by their buttocks, and [k] sent them away.

5 Then there went certain, [l] and told David how the men were served. And he sent to meet them: for the men were greatly ashamed. And the king said, Tarry [m] at Jericho until [n] your beards be grown, and then return.

6 And when the children of Ammon saw that they [o] had made themselves † odious to David, Hanun and the children of Ammon sent [p] a thousand talents of silver, to hire them chariots and horsemen out of Mesopotamia, and out of [q] Syria-maachah, and out of [r] Zobah.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Those who "seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness," shall, in due time and manner, have all other things added unto them.—Communion with God, and his consolations, are intended to animate us to diligence in our proper work, and vigor in our spiritual warfare.—Earthly possessions are often lost by attempting to establish them: and sinners ruin themselves by encouraging and assisting one another, in rebellion against God, and opposition to his cause.—Our good fight of faith, under the Captain of our salvation, will assuredly terminate in everlasting triumph and peace. But the happiness of Israel, through David's victories and equitable administration, very faintly shadowed forth the felicity of the redeemed in the realms above, when the last enemy shall be destroyed, and Jesus shall reign in the midst of them for ever and ever, and they shall behold, and share, the joy and glory of his kingdom. (Heb. 12:2. Notes, Matt. 25:19—23. Rev. 3:20—22.) Let us then, without delay, join ourselves to him, trusting and serving him constantly and faithfully, that at length we may be for ever with him.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIX. V. 1—5. Notes, 2 Sam. 10:1—5.
V. 6. Syria-maachah.] Or, Aram-maachah.

7 So they [s] hired thirty and two thousand chariots, and [t] the king of Maachah and his people; who came and pitched before [u] Medeba. And the children of Ammon gathered themselves together from their cities, and came to battle.

8 And when David heard of it, he sent [x] Joab and all the host of the mighty men.

9 And the children of Ammon came out, and [y] put the battle in array before the gate of the city: and [z] the kings that were come were by themselves in the field.

10 Now [a] when Joab saw that the * battle was [b] set against him before and behind, he chose out of all the † choice of Israel, and put them in array against the Syrians.

11 And the rest of the people he delivered unto the hand of ‡ Abishai his brother, [c] and they set themselves in array against the children of Ammon.

12 And he said, [d] If the Syrians be too strong for me, then thou shalt help me: but if the children of Ammon be too strong for thee, then I will help thee.

13 Be [e] of good courage, and let us behave ourselves valiantly for our people and for the cities of our God: and [f] let the LORD do that which is good in his sight.

14 So Joab, and the people that were with him, drew nigh before the Syrians unto the battle; and [g] they fled before him.

15 And when the children of Ammon saw that the Syrians were fled, [h] they likewise fled before Abishai his brother, and entered into the city. Then Joab came to Jerusalem.

16 ¶ And when the Syrians saw that they were put to the worse before Israel, they sent messengers, [i] and drew forth the Syrians that were beyond the § river: and [k] Shophach the captain of the host of Hadarezer went before them.

17 And it was told David: and he gathered all Israel, and passed over Jordan, and came upon them, [l] and set the battle in array against them. So when David had put the battle in array against the Syrians, they fought with him.

18 But the Syrians [m] fled before Israel; and David slew of the Syrians seven thousand men, which fought in chariots, and forty thousand [n] footmen, and killed Shophach the captain of the host.

19 And when [o] the servants of Hadarezer saw that they were put to the worse before Israel, they made peace with David, and became his servants: neither [p] would the Syrians help the children of Ammon any more.

Maachah (or Maachathi) lay to the east of Jordan, and had been allotted to Manasseh: but it is probable, that the Syrians had got possession of it; and that it was thence called Syria-maachah. (Deut. 3:14. Josh. 12:5.)

(Note, 1 Sam. 13:5.) Either some trivial mistake has crept into the text, in respect of the number or kind of these auxiliaries; or they were used in general to fight, some on foot, and others on horseback; yet on some occasions they all could drive, and fight from chariots of war.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We may expect, that in this world our kindest actions will often be requited with the basest returns, and our best intentions expose us to the most injurious suspicions. Even in our implicit obedience to our great and gracious Lord, when we most sincerely desire to do good to our fellow-creatures, we must lay our account with ingratitude, contempt, and abuse. But these things should not discourage us; for he will plead our cause, and both comfort us, and kindly recompense all that we endure for his sake: and after his example we also should endeavor to make up to those that serve us, every loss to which they are exposed in executing our orders. —In every case the servants of God, though here disgraced, will finally be honored: but none of his enemies will bring upon themselves more sudden and terrible vengeance, than those who insult his ambassadors, when sent with a message of peace and salvation.—The only safety of us sinners consists in submitting to God, making our peace with him, and becoming his servants: thus separating from those who persist in their opposition and rebellion, we may escape their doom.—When prudence, vigilance, courage, and diligence, have been used in a good cause, and we have mutually assisted each other; we may confidently leave the event to the Lord, saying, "Let him do what seemeth him good." But let us look to ourselves, and examine our hearts and lives, and fear, lest having been instruments of good to others, we should ourselve-

Rabbah is taken and spoiled, and the inhabitants are treated with great severity, 1—3. Three giants are slain by David's servants, in three battles against the Philistines, 4—8.

B. C. 1035. AND [a] it came to pass, that * after the year was expired, at the time that kings go out to battle, Joab led forth the power of the army, and [b] wasted the country of the children of Ammon, and came and besieged [c] Rabbah. But David tarried at Jerusalem. And [d] Joab smote Rabbah, and destroyed it.

2 And David took the crown of their king from off his head, and found † it to weigh a talent of gold, and there were precious stones in it; and it was set upon David's head: [e] and he brought also exceeding much spoil out of the city.

3 And [f] he brought out the people that were in it; and cut them [g] with saws, and with harrows of iron, and with axes. Even so dealt David with all the cities of the children of Ammon. And David and all the people returned to Jerusalem.

B. C. 1018. 4 ¶ And it came to pass after this, that [h] there ‡ arose a war [i] at Gezer with the Philistines; at which time [j] Sibbechai the Hushathite slew [k] Sippai, that was of the children of § the giant: and they were subdued.

5 And there was war again with the Philistines; and Elhanan the son of [l] Jair slew Lahmi, the brother of [m] Goliath the Gittite, whose spear's staff was like a weaver's beam.

6 And yet again there was war at Gath, where was a man || of great stature, whose fingers and toes were four and twenty, six on each hand, and six on each foot: and he also was ¶ the son of the giant.

7 But when [n] he  defied Israel, Jonathan the son of [o] Shimea David's brother slew him.

8 These were born unto the giant in Gath; and [p] they fell by the hand of David, and by the hand of his servants.

CHAP. XXI.

David, tempted by Satan, requires Joab to number the people, 1—4. The number is returned to the king, 5, 6. God is displeased, and David owns his fault, 7, 8. The Lord, by Gad the prophet, proposes three judgments to David, who chooses three days' pestilence, 9—13. Seventy thousand are cut off; and David, seeing the destroying angel, intercedes for the people, 14—17. Directed by Gad, he buys Ornan's threshing-floor; and sacrifices: fire consumes the oblation, and the plague is stayed, 18—27. He again sacrifices there, fearing to go unto Gibeon, 28—30.

AND [a] Satan stood up against Israel, and [b] provoked David to number Israel.

2 And David said to [c] Joab and to the rulers of the people, Go, number Israel, from [d] Beer-sheba even to Dan; and

NOTES.

CHAP. XX. V. 1—3. (Notes, 2 Sam. 12:26—31.) The whole account of David's adultery, and of the sins and sufferings consequent upon it, is here entirely omitted. (Notes, 2 Sam. 11:—19:)

V. 4—7. Marg. Ref.—Note, 2 Sam. 21:15—22.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

A pious and benevolent mind cannot possibly delight in mentioning the transgressions of useful and eminent men. So that if truth and candor will permit, and if no good purpose can be answered by speaking, persons of this character will choose to be silent; though they will by no means deny, excuse, or extenuate the sins of any man, when they cannot honestly conceal them. It however proves a malignant or an unfeeling mind, to be always searching into the miscarriages of others, especially those of superior reputation, in the world, or in the church.—The conflicts of believers, like those of David, will be successive, as long as they live here, and sometimes the sharpest are reserved till the last: and their victories will be gradual, as their enemies will still be renewing their assaults, and recovering their strength.—Though the Lord severely correct the sins of his own believing people, he will not leave them in the hands of their enemies; his assistance far more than counterbalances all the advantages, in number and strength, of those that defy his Israel; and all that trust in him shall be made more than conquerors, through him that loveth them.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXI. V. 1. (Note, 2 Sam. 24:1,2.) 'It is said in 2 Sam. 24:1. that God, being angry 'with Israel, moved David, that is, suffered Satan 'to move him. This is sufficiently explained 'there. Only here the phrase stood up is to be 'observed; which was the posture of those who 'charged or accused any person of a crime, in a 'court of justice. See 1 Kings 22:21. Thus 'Satan is represented as "the accuser of the 'brethren," in the book of the Revelation; and 'here to lay some sin to the charge of the Israelites, which he represented to God as a reason 'to punish them. For it is the way of the holy 'Scripture, thus to bring down these things, and 'accommodate them to the lowest capacities.' Bp. Patrick. (Notes, Job 1:9—12. Zech. 3:1—4. Rev. 12:7—12.)

[e] bring the number of them to me, [f] that I may know it.

3 And Joab answered, [g] The LORD make his people an hundred times so many more as they be: but, my lord the king, are they not all my lord's servants? why then doth my lord require this thing? [h] why will he be a cause of trespass to Israel?

4 Nevertheless [i] the king's word prevailed against Joab. [j] Wherefore Joab departed [k] and went throughout all Israel, and came to Jerusalem.

5 And Joab gave the sum of the number of the people unto David. And all they of Israel were [l] a thousand thousand and an hundred thousand men that drew sword: and Judah was four hundred threescore and ten thousand men that drew sword.

6 But [m] Levi and Benjamin counted he not among them: for the king's word was abominable to [n] Joab.

7 * And [o] God was displeased with this thing; therefore [p] he smote Israel.

8 And David said unto God, [q] I have sinned greatly, because I have done this thing: but now, I beseech thee, [r] do away the iniquity of thy servant; for [s] I have done very foolishly.

9 ¶ And the LORD spake unto [t] Gad, David's seer, saying,

10 Go and tell David, saying, Thus saith the LORD, I † offer thee three things: [u] choose thee one of them, [x] that I may do it unto thee,

11 So Gad came to David, and said unto him, Thus saith the LORD, ‡ Choose thee,

12 Either [y] three years' famine; or three months [z] to be destroyed before thy foes, while that the sword of thine enemies overtaketh thee; or else three days [a] the sword of the LORD, [b] even the pestilence, in the land, and [c] the angel of the LORD destroying throughout all the coasts of Israel. [d] Now therefore advise thyself, what word I shall bring again to him that sent me.

13 And David said unto Gad, [e] I am in a great strait: [f] let me fall now into the hand of the LORD; [g] for very § great are his mercies: but [h] let me not fall into the hand of man.

14 ¶ So [i] the LORD sent pestilence upon Israel: and there fell of Israel [j] seventy thousand men.

15 And God sent an angel [k] unto Jerusalem to destroy it: and as he was destroying, the LORD beheld, and he [l] repented him of the evil, and said to the angel that destroyed, [m] It is enough, stay now thine hand. And the angel of the LORD stood by the threshing floor of [n] Ornan the Jebusite.

16 And David lifted up his eyes, and [o] saw the angel of the LORD stand between the earth and the heaven, having a drawn sword in his hand stretched out over Jerusalem. Then David and the elders of Israel, who were [p] clothed in sackcloth, [q] fell upon their faces.

17 And David said unto God, [r] Is it not I that commanded the people to be numbered? even I it is that have sinned and done evil indeed: but as for [s] these sheep, [t] what have they done? [u] Let thine hand, I pray thee, O LORD my God, be on me, and [x] on my father's house: but not on thy people, [y] that they should be plagued.

V. 9—17. Notes, 2 Sam. 24:11—17

18 ¶ Then [z] the angel of the LORD commanded Gad to say to David, [a] that David should go up, and set up an altar unto the LORD, in the threshing floor of Ornan the Jebusite.

19 And David [b] went up at the saying of Gad, which he spake in the name of the LORD.

20 * And Ornan turned back, and saw the angel; and his four sons with him hid themselves. [c] Now Ornan was threshing wheat.

21 And as David came to Ornan, Ornan looked and saw David, and went out of the threshing floor, and [d] bowed himself to David with his face to the ground.

22 Then David said to Ornan, † Grant me the place of this threshing floor, that I may build an altar therein unto the LORD: [e] thou shalt grant it me for the full price: [f] that the plague may be stayed from the people.

23 And Ornan said unto David, [g] Take it to thee, and let my lord the king do that which is good in his eyes: lo, I give thee [h] the oxen also for burnt-offerings, and the threshing instruments for wood, and the wheat for the meat-offering; I give it all.

24 And king David said to Ornan, [i] Nay, but I will verily buy it for the full price; for I will not take that which is thine for the LORD, nor offer burnt-offerings without cost.

25 So [k] David gave to Ornan for the place six hundred shekels of gold by weight.

26 And David [l] built there an altar unto the LORD, and offered burnt-offerings, and peace-offerings, [m] and called upon the LORD; and he answered him from heaven [n] by fire upon the altar of burnt-offering.

27 And [o] the LORD commanded the angel; and [p] he put up his sword again into the sheath thereof.

28 At that time when David saw that the LORD had answered him in the threshing floor of Ornan the Jebusite, then he sacrificed there.

29 For [q] the tabernacle of the LORD, which Moses made in the wilderness, and the altar of the burnt-offering, were at that season in the high place at [r] Gibeon.

30 But David could not go before it to inquire of God: for [s] he was afraid, because of the sword of the angel of the LORD.

V. 18—25. Notes, 2 Sam. 24:18—25.—Saw, &c. (20) The destroying angel was rendered visible, not only to David and the elders of Israel, but to Ornan (or Araunah) and his sons also. Indeed, it is probable, that this awful vision of the angel, with a "drawn sword in his hand, stretched out over Jerusalem," continued apparent to all the inhabitants, till David had offered the appointed sacrifices. The variations in the narrative are noted in the exposition of the parallel passage in Samuel.

V. 26. The fire from heaven was an emblem of divine vindictive justice against sinners: but, this fire consuming the sacrifices, and sparing the offenders, who thus pleaded guilty and sought mercy, was the highest token of the Lord's acceptance of the sacrifice, and a type of our salvation by the propitiatory sufferings of Christ for us. (Notes, Gen. 4:3—5. Lev. 9: 24. 1 Kings 18:38,39. 2 Chr. 7:1—3.)

V. 28—30. David had in general been used to sacrifice at Gibeon; (Notes, 16:37—43. 1 Kings 3·4.) but on this emergency he was afraid to leave Jerusalem, lest the angel should smite the inhabitants: and having been accepted at the threshing floor of Ornan, he continued afterwards to offer sacrifices there. (Note, 22:1.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

So long as we abide on earth Satan has access to us, through the remains of sin in our hearts, especially of pride: and the Lord has wise and righteous reasons for permitting this enemy, under certain restrictions, to tempt his servants. As far as he obtains this permission, he is unwearied in his malicious efforts to deceive, to defile, or to distress us; and he can vary his devices in many plausible ways: but, he does us more harm as a seducer than as an accuser, as a subtle serpent than as a roaring lion. We are therefore called upon to be sober and vigilant, and to pray always that we "enter not into temptation:" and, as men advance in rank and reputation, authority, or usefulness, they have need to redouble the guard, and to be more watchful and instant in prayer than ever; for the enemy levels his assaults especially against those who are eminent in character, or fill up public stations, in the church or in the community; because their falls involve numbers either in sin or suffering.—It is a mercy to be speedily made sensible of our guilt, when we have been left to transgress: but no confession or humiliation can secure us from present sufferings, when we have committed such crimes, as appear abominable even to ungodly men, and bring an open scandal upon our profession.—By thus yielding to temptation we bring ourselves into dreadful straits, from which we can by no means extricate ourselves: yet, even in this case, there is encouragement for us to leave our cause in the hand of the Lord, that he may do with us as he pleases; "for very great are his mercies."—Of all the painful consequences of transgression,

CHAP. XXII.

David makes large preparations for the temple, 1—5. He instructs Solomon, and charges him to build it, 6—16. He commands the elders of Israel to assist him, 17—19.

THEN David said, [a] This is the house of the LORD God, [b] and this is the altar of the burnt-offering for Israel.

2 And David commanded to gather together [c] the strangers that were in the land of Israel: and he set [d] masons to hew wrought stones to build the house of God.

3 And David [e] prepared iron in abundance for the nails for the doors of the gates, and for the joinings; and brass in abundance [f] without weight;

4 Also [g] cedar-trees in abundance: for the Zidonians, and they of Tyre brought much cedar-wood to David.

5 And David said, [h] Solomon my son is young and tender, and the house that is to be builded for the LORD must be [i] exceeding magnifical, of fame and of glory throughout all countries: I will therefore now make preparation for it. So [k] David prepared abundantly before his death.

6 Then he called for Solomon his son, and [l] charged him to build an house for the LORD God of Israel.

7 And David said to Solomon, My son, as for me, [m] it was in my mind to build an house [n] unto the name of the LORD my God:

8 But the word of the LORD came to me, saying, [o] Thou hast shed blood abundantly, and hast made great wars: [p] thou shalt not build an house unto my name, because thou hast shed much blood upon the earth in my sight.

9 Behold, [q] a son shall be born to thee, who shall be a man of rest; and [r] I will give him rest from all his enemies round about: for his name shall be * Solomon, none in this world can be more distressing to an ingenuous mind, than to see those whom we most love, and desire the most to do good to, suffering heavily through our sins. But even under the anguish of this trial, we must not allow ourselves to murmur, or to despond.—The Lord has righteous reasons for his dispensations, though mysterious to us: and therefore they, who are reciprocally suffering through each other's sins, should unite together in humiliation before him, and in fervently deprecating the effects of his indignation from each other. This forms the proper employment of every individual, in times of general calamity: and when public honor has thus been rendered to the righteous Author of national sufferings, his merciful interposition may be expected. He knows how to educe good from evil, and to over-rule our sufferings, nay, even our sins, for the good of our souls, and the promotion of true religion.—The fear of impending vengeance, from the wrath of an offended God, is naturally calculated to drive men from him. But in subserviency to the gospel, and through the influence of the Spirit of God, it concurs in shewing sinners the preciousness of Christ; disposing them to forsake all for him, and afterwards enlarging the mind in grateful obedience to him, who has saved them from so great a destruction. Those who shelter their souls, as it were, under the atonement of his sacrifice, who "suffered once for sins, the just for the unjust," will be safe from danger, even in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment: and none are losers, by being willing to part with all for the sake of Christ, or to dedicate all to his service.—When the urgency of our affairs constrains us to act contrary to our previous methods and rules, or to our inclination, we shall frequently learn afterwards, that, by so doing, we were preparing the way for some important benefit from the Lord to us or to others: and in the observance of his directions, we may confidently expect acceptance and returning comfort.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXII. V. 1. The Lord, having pointed out the place, where he would have sacrifice offered for averting the pestilence, and having "answered by fire from heaven;" David was assured, probably by immediate inspiration, that it was his will, the temple should be built by Solomon on this very spot. It had immediately before been in the possession of a Jebusite, which was an intimation of mercy intended for the Gentiles through Jesus Christ. (21:18.)—It does not appear, whether David removed the ark thither with its tent, or whether it remained in its former place.—Henceforth this became the spot, which God "chose to place his name there," and where sacrifices were regularly offered, as long as that dispensation lasted. (Notes, Deut. 12:5—7. 2 Chr. 3:1,2. Ps. 78:67—69. John 4:19—24.)

V. 2—5. David, though denied the honor of building the temple, yet out of love to so good a work, employed himself in making every kind of preparation for it. (Notes, 18:9—17, v. 11. 28:11—18. 29:1—9.)—The strangers, here mentioned, seem to have been the remnant of the old inhabitants, who, having submitted to David, had their lives spared, and had been reduced to bondage. (Note, 1 Kings 9:20—22.)—David procured much cedar-wood for the temple; but Solomon had occasion for a great deal more. (Marg. Ref.)—According to the nature of that introductory dispensation, and for an emblem of the spiritual glory of Christ and his church, Solomon's temple was built with great magnificence: that, being renowned through all countries, strangers might be induced to visit it, and thus become acquainted with JEHOVAH, and his true worship. Solomon also would need every encouragement and assistance for so great a work, as succeeding to the throne of Israel when young, and being called to perform so arduous and important a ser

11 Now, my son, [y] the LORD be with thee; and prosper thou, and build the house of the LORD thy God, as he hath said of thee.

12 Only [z] the LORD give thee wisdom and understanding, and give thee charge concerning Israel, [a] that thou mayest keep the law of the LORD thy God.

13 Then [b] shalt thou prosper, if thou takest heed [c] to fulfil the statutes and judgments, which the LORD charged Moses with concerning Israel: [d] be strong, and of good courage; dread not, nor be dismayed.

14 Now, behold, in my * trouble I have prepared for the house of the LORD [e] an hundred thousand talents of gold, and a thousand thousand talents of silver; and of brass and iron [f] without weight; for it is in abundance: timber also and stone have I prepared; and thou mayest add thereto.

vice; that he might not be retarded from entering on it in an early period of his reign. (Note, 1 Kings 3:5—14.)

V. 6—10. (Notes, Num. 27:18,19. 2 Tim. 4:1 —8.) David was a type of Christ in his conflicts, victories, and the destruction of his obstinate enemies: but Solomon represented the Savior triumphant, glorified, and giving peace and felicity to his willing subjects. In this latter character, "the Prince of peace" erects his spiritual temple; and it more accorded to the nature of the Christian dispensation, and to the character of Jesus, both of which were represented in this transaction, that the temple should be built by a peaceable prince, than by a successful warrior. Yet, David in his wars did the work and sought the honor of God, and was eminently serviceable to his people: and he was desirous also of building the temple. (Notes, 2 Sam. 7:1—5,12—16. 12: 24,25. 1 Kings 8:17—21. Zech. 6:12,13.)

Hast shed blood. (8) 'Though David's wars 'were warranted, and succeeded by God in an 'extraordinary manner; yet it did not suit so well 'with the divine Majesty to have an house built 'him by one who had shed so much blood, as by 'one that reigned in peace and quietness: that he 'might be an emblem of the King of peace, the 'Lord of the church, who was prefigured in all 'such great transactions.' Bp. Patrick.

For ever. (10) 'This can belong to none in 'the proper and full sense of the word, but Christ 'alone. For Solomon reigned but forty years, and 'after that his kingdom was torn in pieces. There-'fore to Christ the author to the Hebrews applies 'them, Heb. 1:5.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 11, 12. David had given Solomon exhortations and instructions; but the powerful influence of divine grace alone could form him to that wisdom, piety, and zeal, which such a work required. This he earnestly prayed for in Solomon's behalf, and taught him to pray for and confidently to expect: for the language may be understood as an assurance that it would be so; as well as a prayer that it might be so. The connexion also of the several particulars is well worthy of notice. The Lord must give the wisdom and understanding, in order that he might keep the charge and the law: for this would be the genuine and sure effect, and thus prosperity would be the result. (Notes, 13. 1 Kings 3:5—14. Ps. 72:1,2.)

V. 13. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 28:7,8. Josh. 1: 7,8.) Conscientious obedience to the commands of God, on scriptural principles, both secures final success, and inspires present courage and confidence.

V. 14. The gold and silver here mentioned, if computed by the ordinary weight of the talent, would amount to eight or nine hundred millions sterling: and this enormous quantity would have more than sufficed to erect an edifice, as large as the temple itself apart from its courts, of solid gold and silver. Compared therefore with the size of the temple, and with the gains of Solomon, when the precious metals became common at Jerusalem; (1 Kings 9:14,28.) it is generally concluded, either that some mistake has taken place in the numeral letters, or that a talent of inferior weight and value is meant.—David had collected this wealth for the temple in his trouble, or in his poverty. He had set out in life very poor; he had passed through a constant succession of trials and troubles, not only before he came to the kingdom, but during his whole reign; and all his prosperity was the result of the Lord's singular kindness, in making him a gainer by all the attempts of his numerous enemies.—He seems also to speak of his preparation as a small matter, to seek the LORD your God: [q] arise therefore, and build ye the sanctuary of the LORD God, [r] to bring the ark of the covenant of the LORD, and the holy vessels of God, into the house that is to be built [s] to the name of the LORD.

whether compared with the greatness of the Lord to whom it was dedicated, or with his own obligations to him. (Note, 29:10—19.)

V. 15—19. Marg. Ref.—Notes, 28:20,21. 29:2—9,21—25.—Set your heart, &c. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

When the grace of God possesses the heart, a man's falls and mistakes will eventually be overruled to form him to such a humble and watchful frame of mind, as will exceedingly increase the simplicity, purity, and activity of his zeal in the service of God.—The most eminent servants of the Lord are apt sometimes to abate their diligence; and alarming providences often concur with the warnings and rebukes of the Scripture, to stir them up to greater earnestness: especially when they are reminded of the approach of death, and perceive that much remains to be done, and that probably they have only a short time in which to do it.—When the Lord refuses to employ us in those kinds and in that measure of service to his church, which we desired and hoped to perform; we must not on that account yield to indolence or discouragement. But we should be doing what we can, in a subordinate sphere, and upon a smaller scale; and rejoice in affording any little assistance to those who are honored with more extensive usefulness. The "spirit that is in us," indeed, powerfully "lusteth to envy;" but we must seek unto him, who "giveth more grace," that this evil may be mortified and subdued.—We are not likely on earth to witness those glorious times which are foretold in the Scriptures, when Satan shall no more deceive the nations, and "the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea:" yet, it is possible that we may be, as it were, collecting materials for that work. Whatever is done towards rendering the word of God more generally known, understood, and attended to, in the world, is like bringing a stone, perhaps an ingot of gold, towards erecting the edifice. Whatever tends to bring the rising generations, in succession, acquainted with the gospel of Jesus Christ, in its purity and energy, is, as it were, enlisting soldiers for that decisive conflict, in which the armies of Christ shall obtain most glorious victories. These considerations should encourage us, when we are grieved that we see no more fruits of all our labors. Much good may appear after our death, which was hidden from us, "lest we should be exalted above measure." "Let us not then be weary of well doing; for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not."—Above all, they who are aged, and expect shortly to be removed to a better world, should diligently instruct, encourage, charge, and caution those, who are young and inexperienced, and who are likely to succeed them in their work. The service is arduous and important, being intimately connected with the honor of God, and the salvation of souls; and "who is sufficient for these things?" Indeed, all our sufficiency must be of God He allots various services to his people; and that which qualifies for one kind of usefulness, may unfit for another: we should then all acquiesce in his will; and fill up our proper place for the common benefit, as the members do in the human body. (Note, Rom. 12:3—8.) But peace is in its own nature preferable to the most successful wars; and the shedding of human blood, though sometimes necessary, should always be done with great reluctance, and thought of with horror: for even when the Lord commanded it, he was pleased to speak of it, as "shed in his sight," and as what he had no pleasure in beholding. We should therefore be far more ambitious of the honor of giving rest and quietness to those around us, than of the conqueror's applause. "Blessed are the peace-makers; for they shall be called the children of God." (Notes, Matt. 5:9. Jam. 3:17,18.)—Among other unspeakable advantages of public peace, this is peculiarly important, that it affords the fairest opportunities of executing useful designs to promote true religion: and then, we should be active and earnest to seize the favorable opportunity, by forming or assisting every design of general utility. (Note, Acts 9:31.)—But especially peace among Christians is conducive to this most desirable end; which is grievously counteracted by the animosities, divisions, and vehement controversies, which, alas! prevail and are multiplied. Did all real believers "endeavor to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace," and to strive together for "the faith of the gospel;" such effects would follow, as seem at present to exceed our largest expectations or conceptions. (Note and P. O. Eph. 4:1—6.) The work is, however, in the hands of "the Prince of peace:" may he compose all our differences, and build the spiritual temple so magnificent and glorious, that the fame of it may be spread into all countries, till all the nations of the earth become his willing subjects, and live in love and peace with each other!

Even the young, the weak, and inexperienced, when called forth to service by the Lord, may expect that he will be with them; and that he will give them upright, zealous minds, with true wisdom and understanding, and then cause them to prosper in their work.—No abilities or diligence can render us durably and extensively useful to others, if we do not take heed to our own conduct, that it be regulated according to the word of God. While we trust in his grace and mercy, and obey his commandments, we need fear no difficulties or opposition; the things which seem to be against us will "work together for our good:" we should then be "strong in the Lord," and of good courage, and not dread or be dismayed at the prospect of any temptations, troubles, or persecutions, which may meet us in the way of our duty.—In such an age and nation as this, we of course enter in many respects into the labors of others: but to all the preparation hitherto made in any place, we shall find it requisite to add far more; for much, very much remains to be done to render us "a peculiar people, zealous of good works." (Note, Tit. 2:14.) All our advantages, and all the promises of the gospel, are intended to encourage our activity, and not to excuse our sloth. And, whether we seek our own salvation, or that of other men, we must "arise, and be doing."—The whole weight of public services should not be laid upon those who sustain public characters. Others are commanded to assist them in proportion to their talents and abilities; and they are exhorted to set their hearts and souls thus to seek and serve the Lord, that the good works, which have been devised, may be completed without needless delay. Thus nobles, senators, magistrates, and indeed every subject in his place, should concur with the king, in every scriptural measure for stopping the progress of immorality and profaneness, and for promoting the fear of God, and a regard to his truths, ordinances, and commandments: first they should lead the way by a good example; then they should proceed to employ their authority and influence, to give effect to such endeavors: and finally, they should seek the blessing of God upon them by fervent prayers. Thus likewise, the leading persons in congregations should second to the uttermost the labors of the minister for the good of souls: their unanimity, forbearance, and cordiality, their pious examples, family-religion, and earnest prayers, should never be wanting, that they may add weight to his exhortations, strengthen his hands, encourage him in his arduous work, and bring a blessing upon it. Yet, alas! how contrary is the conduct of too many, who would be thought friends to the gospel! In the church, in their families, and in their worldly concerns, they act as if they meant to counteract the labors of ministers; to weaken their influence, to discourage their hearts, to prejudice men's minds against the blessed truths which they preach, and to embolden all around them to disregard their warnings and exhortations!—But surely, if "the LORD indeed be with us," and has given us rest from our enemies; we shall set our hearts and souls to seek him, and by every means in our power, to glorify his name, and promote the peace and prosperity of his church.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIII. V. 1. David named Solomon his successor.—If this transaction preceded his last sickness, and Adonijah's usurpation, that usurpation was thus rendered more inexcusable: for it is evident that David acted as a prophet, as well as with the full concurrence of his people. (Notes, 29:21—25. 1 Kings 1:5,6. 2:15—18.)

V. 2—6. The ark being now stationed at Jerusalem, the place of the temple appointed, and great preparations made for the building of it; (16:1. 22:1—4,14.) David proceeded to reduce the whole service of the priests and Levites to method, which seems before to have been conducted with less regularity. The Israelites had been greatly increased; and we may suppose that, towards the close of David's reign, the occasional sacrifices were far more numerous than they had been. The priests and Levites also were greatly multiplied; and it was of importance to make every thing ready for conducting the service, with proportionable splendor and solemnity, as soon as the temple was finished. David therefore began his arrangements with numbering the Levites, from thirty years of age, as in the time of Moses: but it does not appear, that such as were above fifty years old were omitted. (Notes, 24—28. Num. 4:3. 8:24—26.) The priests, who were very numerous, were not included in the sum total here mentioned; so that this tribe had increased in greater proportion than the others.—Twenty-four thousand Levites were employed to "set forward the work of the house of the LORD:" (4) that is, to assist the priests in every thing pertaining to the sacrifices, and in removing from the temple and its courts whatever might be polluting and offensive; that the whole service might be performed with expedition and exactness, and every thing preserved entirely clean and beautiful. (28) It is also probable, that, while the temple was building, they were employed in superintending the workmen. They served in rotation by courses; and it may be concluded, that every week a thousand came in, and a thousand went out. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 2 Kings 11:5—9.) Doubtless it was also intended, that they should be instructers of the people, in their several districts, when not employed at the sanctuary. (Notes, Num. 35:2—8. 2 Chr. 30:21,22.) Six thousand were employed as magistrates, in the different parts of the country, and perhaps they likewise acted in rotation. (4) Four thousand kept the doors of the sanctuary, that no unclean or improper person might enter the courts; that no disturbance might be made, to interrupt the sacred services; that none but priests might go into the temple; and that no one in one reckoning, according to their father's house.

12 ¶ The [s] sons of Kohath; Amram, Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel, four.

13 The [t] sons of Amram; Aaron and Moses: and Aaron was [u] separated, that he should [x] sanctify the most holy things, he and his sons for ever, [y] to burn incense before the LORD to minister unto him, and [z] to bless in his name for ever.

14 Now concerning Moses [a] the man of God, [b] his sons were named of the tribe of Levi.

15 The sons of Moses were [c] Gershom and Eliezer.

16 Of the sons of Gershom, [d] Shebuel was the chief.

17 And the sons of Eliezer were, Rehabiah * the chief. And Eliezer had none other sons; but the sons of Rehabiah † were very many.

18 Of the sons of Izhar, [e] Shelomith the chief.

19 Of the sons of [f] Hebron; Jeriah the first, Amariah the second, Jahaziel the third, and Jekameam the fourth.

20 Of the sons of Uzziel; Micah the first, and Jesiah the second.

21 ¶ The sons of [g] Merari; [h] Mahli and Mushi. The sons of Mahli; Eleazar and Kish.

22 And Eleazar died, and [i] had no sons, but daughters: and their ‡ brethren the sons of Kish [k] took them.

23 The sons of Mushi; Mahli, and Eder, and [l] Jeremoth, three.

24 ¶ These were [m] the sons of Levi [n] after the house of their fathers: even the chief of their fathers, as they were counted by number of names [o] by their polls, that did the work for the service of the house of the LORD, from the age of [p] twenty years and upward.

25 For David said, [q] The LORD God of Israel hath given rest unto his people, § that they may dwell in Jerusalem for ever;

26 And also unto the Levites: they shall no more [r] carry the tabernacle, nor any vessels of it for the service thereof.

27 For [s] by the last words of David, the Levites were ‖ numbered from twenty years old and above:

28 Because their ¶ office was to wait on the sons of Aaron [t] for the service of the house of the LORD, in the courts, and [u] in the chambers, and in the [x] purifying of all holy things, and the work of the service of the house of God;

29 Both for [y] the shew-bread, and for [z] the fine flour for meat-offering, and for the [a] unleavened cakes, and for that which is baked in the  pan, and for that which is fried, and for all manner of [b] measure and size;

30 And to [c] stand [d] every morning to thank and praise the LORD, and likewise at even;

(Note, 6:48.)

V. 24—28. (Note, 2—6.) The work of the Levites was by no means so laborious at this time, as when the tabernacle was carried by them, along with Israel in their journeys; and perhaps numbers of the young Levites, being out of employ, contracted bad habits or set bad examples: therefore David, as a prophet, ordered this change. Twenty-five years of age had been the earliest term of their entering upon their probationary services, but now they were to be employed from twenty years old: and, as a matter of importance, David confirmed it with his last words. Those Levites, who acted as magistrates, (4) had the inspection of weights and measures of every kind, that no fraud might in this way be committed. 4 And there were more [h] chief men found of [i] the sons of Eleazar than of the sons of Ithamar: and thus were they divided. Among the sons of Eleazar there were sixteen chief men of the house of their fathers, and eight among the sons of Ithamar [k] according to the house of their fathers.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

If we be prepared for death, having accomplished our measure of services, and seeing others raised up to succeed us in the church or the community, according to our several situations, we surely may be "full of days," whatever our term of life may be: and satisfied with living in this world of sin and sorrow, of vanity and temptation, we may rejoice to leave all below, and even to be absent from our bodies, that we may go to heaven and be present with the Lord. (Notes and P. O. 2 Cor. 5:1—8.)—We should be thankful, in declining years, to be eclipsed by men of real integrity, piety, and useful endowments, who are coming forward upon the stage of action: yet, we should still endeavor to do all we can to promote the common cause of religion; and sometimes the sagacity and experience of old age, when incapable of much bodily exertion, may suggest and effect more real good, than the vigor and activity of youth.—The increase of ministers is of great importance, provided they be men of God, zealous for his glory, and earnestly seeking the salvation of souls. In this case they will desire employment, and in one way or other will be usefully active.—But it is expedient that every one should know his proper place, to help forward the work of the house of the Lord; to promote equity and justice; to instruct the people in the truths and precepts of God's word, to take care that his ordinances be duly administered; and to excite and assist the people in his sacred worship.—Every method should be used to prevent the irregularity, indolence, and worldly lusts, of this order of men, whose example, influence, and conversation are more useful, or more pernicious, than those of any other; and who are commonly either better or worse employed, than the other orders in society.—Though it is generally inexpedient, that the more arduous part of the sacred ministry should be performed by very young men; yet those who are intended for this service, ought by no means to waste their youth in inactivity or dissipation; but to employ their time in preparatory and initiatory studies and exercises.—A constant succession of religious duties, stated or occasional, public or private, must engage the true minister's attention, day by day continually: and if a man cannot take pleasure in such employments, he must soon be weary of the work, as a drudgery; and will either neglect it, or attend upon it unwillingly, for the sake of his wages. (P. O. Acts 6:1—7. Notes, 1 Tim. 4:12—16.) A new heart, a spiritual mind, which delights greatly in God's commandments, is the first and most essential qualification for the ministry; as indeed it forms the great distinction between the true Christian, and all other men in the world. To the spiritual man every successive service will yield renewed satisfaction; and he will be unwearied, and always abounding and delighting in the work of the Lord; being never so happy, as when employed for such a good Master, in so pleasant a service. With him the work itself, and the success of his labors, are the principal objects: the emolument or maintenance (though he has a right to it, and perhaps cannot live without it,) is a very subordinate consideration: nor will he much regard whether he be called to take the lead, or whether he keep the charge of others who are placed over him, provided they do not bind his hands, or impede his usefulness. (Notes, 1 Tim. 3:1—7. 1 Pet. 5:1—4.) These are indeed "men of God:" may he supply his church with numbers of them; in the place of those hirelings, who have in all ages swarmed in the professing church, to the scandal of religion and the ruin of their own souls! Such ministers as have been described, will be accepted and useful in the most obscure situations; and will subserve the interests of morality most effectually, as well as promote the spiritual worship of God through Jesus Christ. And should they leave their families in poverty and obscurity, after their decease: this circumstance will be a testimony before the world of their disinterestedness; and the Lord will surely provide for their wants, as far as is truly good for them. He advances, and he abases, as his infinite wisdom sees good, whatever may be our cares or desires. May we then seek and serve him uprightly, and leave all the rest to his disposal, by faith in his word and resignation to his righteous will!

V. 6. The regulation of these courses of the priests was made by casting lots, before the king and all the chief persons in the land, in a most solemn manner; and a record was made of the transaction, to prevent any future contest. First, one household was taken of Eleazar's race, and then one of Ithamar's, till sixteen had been completed; after which the remaining eight of Eleazar's sons, were arranged according to the order in which their lots came forth.

V. 7. It was thought, by the Jews in after ages, a great honor to be descended from Jehoiarib. The Maccabees were descended from him; (1 Mac. 2:1—4.) and Josephus thought himself noble, because he sprang from the first of these twenty-four courses.

V. 10. Abijah.] The courses of the priests, established by David, were continued, with some alterations, till the days of Christ: these records must therefore have been very useful to the Jews, after their return from the Babylonish captivity. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Ezra 2:36—39. Luke 1:5—7.)

V. 19. Under Aaron their father.] All the priests were considered as Aaron's successors, and as filling up his place, in whose person the whole priesthood was originally vested, and from whom it was derived to his posterity.—These arrangements having been made by David, acting under the divine direction, and according to the commandment given by Moses concerning the priesthood; the courses of the priests attended, each during one week at a time, for the ordinary services; though at the great festivals, and on other public occasions, numbers of the rest would be present and assist.

to have been the heads of those twenty-four thousand Levites, who in twenty-four courses waited on the priests in their ministrations. (23:4.)

V. 31. The principal, &c.] The whole company being ranged, according to their families, into the proper number of divisions, the order of their courses was assigned them by lot, without respect to rank or seniority.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord will certainly perform all his promises and threatenings; and if they do not take effect suddenly, and with observation, they will do it gradually and silently.—Sin ruins men's characters, comforts, and families; and will destroy the immortal souls of all those, who do not obtain salvation by faith in Jesus Christ.—In all cases we ought to act with exact impartiality, as far as we are able: and when human prudence fails of discerning a reason of preference, where it must be given; it is right, in one way or other, to refer the determination to the Lord.—Much wisdom and equity is requisite to exclude occasions of envy, jealousy, and contention, in the regulation of public affairs, where numbers are concerned: but what is done fairly and openly, and in the fear of God, is placed upon the most permanent basis.—The solemn appointment and orderly attendance of ministers, is of considerable importance; but they are all under the hand of Jesus, from whom they receive their commission and instructions, as well as their qualifications; and to whom they are all accountable.—Difference of age, learning, piety, reputation, and other circumstances, gives external precedency to some ministers; but they are all brethren, and none ought to act as lords, with despotic rule, or domineer over the others. (Note, 1 Pet. 5:1—4. P. O. 1—7.) Thus, in Jesus Christ, there is neither male nor female, bond nor free; but all believers are one in him, being children of God, fellow-heirs of eternal life, and brethren to each other. May they all on earth emulate that love, peace, and harmony, which will subsist in the heavenly world!

NOTES.

CHAP. XXV. V. 1—6. "The captains of the host," (1) seem to mean the leaders, or heads, of the several courses of the priests and Levites.—Jeduthun either was the same person, as was before called Ethan; or Ethan was dead, and Jeduthun succeeded him. (15:17—19. Note, 22.)—The word prophesy, in this place, seems to mean no more, than praising God by singing inspired prophetical hymns, with great earnestness and devout affections, under the influences of the Holy Spirit. As the prophets in Samuel's days used music and singing; it has been conjectured, that he first introduced them into the regular worship of Israel, and that David reduced to order what he found already established. (Notes, 9: 22. 1 Sam. 10:5,6.)—These persons are said to have "prophesied according to the order of the king;" because he instituted the order of their services.—Only five sons of Jeduthun are here named; but Shimei, afterwards mentioned, is supposed to have been the sixth. (17) Perhaps, though as Jeduthun's son he was chosen to be the head of one course, he was at this time young, and not fit for present service.—Heman seems to have been a prophet, or "seer," in the common acceptation, and was much consulted by David: "he lifted up the horn," or presided over those who used wind-instruments of music. V. 7. These two hundred and eighty-eight, being twenty-four courses of twelve each, were more skilful than the other Levites; and being placed under the twenty-four sons of the chief singers, they had the four thousand before mentioned divided among them, to officiate by courses, according to their instructions. (23:5.) 'Twelve 'of those singers, with their governor, came and 'waited every week; at the end of which they 'were succeeded by other twelve, till the course 'was finished.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 8. Even among the twenty-four leaders, some were more expert than others; some were teachers, and others scholars; but every one was taken by the solemn casting of lots, without any regard to these distinctions. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord is in himself exalted far above all blessing and praise, and our obligations to him are infinite: we ought therefore to give him thanks, and to praise him, with our noblest powers; and to render every kind and degree of capacity, ingenuity, or skill, which we possess, subservient to that highest end: but especially our best and most lively affections are his due. Every part of his service is delightful, in proportion as we are properly disposed: yet we should apply our minds to instruction, that we may become "workmen that need not be ashamed," as capable of performing our several duties with propriety and readiness.—Human prudence must regulate certain circumstances relative to religious worship; and every society, larger or smaller, should order such matters for themselves, to the best of their judgment: but unless the Spirit of God put life and fervor into our devotions, they will, however appointed, be a lifeless, worthless form.—We should all be ready to give or to receive instructions, without self-preference, or accounting ourselves degraded: for in God's sight the teachable scholar is nearly as honorable as the able instructer.—It is pleasant to receive all our temporal and domestic comforts, as given unto us of God, and then to devote them all to his service: and it is a singular mercy to have a large family, all employed and accepted by him. But whether our children and connexions be few or many, may we and they be all his, and meet in his temple above to sing his praises for ever! Whatever Providence may allot us here, may this be the lot and portion of our inheritance hereafter!

5 Ammiel the sixth, Issachar the seventh, Peulthai the eighth: for [f] God blessed [*] him.

6 Also unto Shemaiah his son were sons born, that ruled throughout the house of their father: for they were [g] mighty men of valor.

7 The sons of Shemaiah; Othni, and Rephael, and Obed, Elzabad, whose brethren were strong men, Elihu and Semachiah.

V. 4, 5. (Marg.) The numerous and prosperous family of Obed-edom was the effect of the divine blessing, by which his reverential regard to the ark was recompensed. (Notes, 2 Sam. 6:10—13.)

V. 6—12. Marg. Ref.—Mighty men, &c. (6) The porters, and treasurers of the temple, had occasion for strength and valor, both to oppose such as improperly attempted to enter the courts or sanctuary, or to raise any disturbance there; and also to guard the sacred treasures of money, vessels, flour, frankincense, wine, and oil, there deposited, and of which some of them were appointed to keep an account. (20. Notes, 9:27—30.)—Josephus speaks of the gates of the temple being so massy, as to require twenty persons to open or shut them: this too would find employment for the strength of the porters. The temple indeed was not yet built; but David had received from the Lord a pattern of what it was to be, and he arranged every thing with reference to it. (Notes, 28:11—18.)—It is supposed, that the families of the Levites, succeeded to the lot of their fathers, whether as singers, porters, or whatever was the service assigned them; and this from one generation to another, without passing from one company to another. 'They were distributed into courses, 'as the priests and Levites were; and these were 'principal commanders over them: being the 'more illustrious of their brethren, and therefore 'particularly named.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 13. The porters seem to have been divided into courses, by a different method than the other Levites. The several families or divisions of them cast lots, at which gates they should keep ward; and then the individuals of those divisions attended in rotation; but whether the order, in which they thus followed each other, was determined by lot, or by agreement, it does not appear.

V. 14. A wise counsellor.] It seems that Zechariah, being renowned for his wisdom, was preferred to be the king's counsellor. The office of porter in the temple was a place of great trust, and therefore honorable.

V. 15. "Asuppim" signifying gatherings, it is supposed, that the house of Asuppim was a building erected to contain the money that was collected, for the use of the sanctuary, with the vessels employed in the sacred services.

V. 24—27. These are the only persons among the descendants of Moses, who are mentioned, as appointed to any office of honor and distinction. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 13:11. 22:6—14.)

V. 28. Samuel, &c.] It had been customary from the time of Abraham, (Notes, Gen. 14:18—20. 28:20—22.) and probably from the beginning of the world, for persons to dedicate a portion of their gains to the service of God, as an acknowledgment that all came from him: but it is uncertain whether Samuel, or the other persons here mentioned, had an expectation of a temple being built, for which they desired to make preparation.

V. 29. Marg. Ref.—Note, 23:2—6.—The outward business, &c.] These Levites seem not to have performed any service within the precincts of the sanctuary: and their employment on that account may be called "the outward business." In general, it may be supposed, that, as well as the other Levites, they were expected to be instructers of the people in the law of God: and in particular they were made magistrates of different orders, to administer justice to the people. As the Levites were more numerous, than could be employed in the sanctuary; and as they ought to be, and had opportunities of being, better acquainted with the law than the other Israelites; they were appointed to this service, along with the elders of every tribe. (Note, 2 Chr. 19:5—11.) From these, the scribes, lawyers, or doctors of the law, mentioned in the New Testament, seem to have arisen. As the office of the magistracy reaches only to the regulation of the outward conduct; whilst the ministry of the word forms the means of regulating the mind or judgment, with the conscience and affections of the heart; the former may in this sense also be called the outward business. The lawyers above mentioned made the whole of religion a mere outward business; and they have always had abundance of disciples in this respect. (Notes, Matt. 23:25—28. Luke 11:37—41.)

V. 30—32. Hebron was first assigned to the priests; (Note, Josh. 21:11,12.) but it was afterwards occupied by Levites, perhaps as tenants whilst the priests were but few. The Levites here mentioned, it seems, lived there, till they had acquired the name of Hebronites, and then removed over Jordan into the land of Gilead. But being sought out, they were appointed judges, and officers, for various purposes, civil and ecclesiastical, superior and inferior, on each side Jordan, in two divisions: though the larger proportion was assigned to those who lived east of that river; perhaps because, being more remote from the sanctuary and the seat of government, they needed more attention to keep them to their duty, both to God, and to the king. (Marg. Ref.)

Fortieth year.—(31) It is generally thought that most or all of these regulations were made in the last year of David's life: but, though this be uncertain, they were certainly arranged towards the close of his reign.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The blessing of God renders individuals happy, and families flourishing: and those, who have been faithful in a little, will be made rulers over many things.—Wisdom, courage, strength of faith, holy affections, and constancy of mind in our duty, are requisite for every station. But those, who minister in the house of the Lord, and are required, without respect of persons, to prevent the profanation of holy things, have peculiar

CHAP. XXVII.

NOW the children of Israel after their number, to wit, the chief fathers and [a] captains of thousands and hundreds, and their officers that [b] served the king in [c] any matter of the courses, which came in and went out [d] month by month throughout all the months of the year, of every course, were twenty and four thousand.

2 Over the first course for the first month, was [e] Jashobeam the son of Zabdiel: and in his course were twenty and four thousand.

3 Of the children of [f] Perez, was [g] the chief of all the captains of the host for the first month.

4 And over the course of the second month was [h] Dodai an Ahohite, and of his course was Mikloth also the ruler: in his course likewise were twenty and four thousand.

5 The third captain of the host for the third month was [i] Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, a * chief priest: and in his course were twenty and four thousand.

6 This is that Benaiah, who was [k] mighty among the thirty, and above the thirty: and in his course was Ammizabad his son.

7 The fourth captain for the fourth month was [l] Asahel the brother of Joab, and Zebadiah his son after him: and in his course were twenty and four thousand.

8 The fifth captain for the fifth month was [m] Shamuth the Izrahite: and in his course were twenty and four thousand.

9 The sixth captain for the sixth month was [n] Ira the son of Ikkesh the Tekoite: and in his course were twenty and four thousand.

10 The seventh captain for the seventh month was [o] Helez the [p] Pelonite, of the children of Ephraim: and in his course were twenty and four thousand.

11 The eighth captain for the eighth month was [q] Sibbecai the Hushathite, of the [r] Zarhites: and in his course were twenty and four thousand.

12 The ninth captain for the ninth month was Abiezer the [s] Anetothite, of the Benjamites: and in his course were twenty and four thousand.

13 The tenth captain for the tenth month was [t] Maharai the Netophathite, of the [u] Zarhites: and in his course were twenty and four thousand.

14 The eleventh captain for the eleventh month was [x] Benaiah the Pirathonite, of the children of Ephraim: and in his course were twenty and four thousand.

15 The twelfth captain for the twelfth month was [y] Heldai the Netophathite, of [z] Othniel: and in his course were twenty and four thousand.

need of these qualifications. They are the porters of the spiritual house, and the "stewards of the mysteries of God;" a charge is committed to their trust, infinitely more valuable than all the treasures of the temple; and they need to be watchful and faithful. (Notes, Matt. 24:45—51. Mark 13:33—37. Luke 11:35—46. 1 Cor. 4:1—5.) Their office requires them "rightly to divide the word of truth," and to administer divine ordinances according to it; that the hungry souls may be fed and feasted from the provisions of the Lord's house; and that he may be glorified by their spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to him through Jesus Christ. Great integrity, firmness, and discretion, are necessary to do this according to the mind of the great Master of the family, and to prevent abuses, and prostitution of sacred ordinances to secular purposes, by ungodly men. From these sacred treasuries, "the unsearchable riches of Christ," all our wants are supplied: but receiving from his fulness, and being victorious over our enemies by his grace, we must give him the glory, and endeavor to dispose of the whole of our abilities and substance according to his will; allotting a proportion to maintain the expense of his worship, as well as to provide for the poor. Many unbelievers, however, join in these external services, and we must not in any degree rest our hopes of salvation on them.—The work of the minister requires the whole man: internal renovation is immediately its object; and the outward business of external order in society properly belongs to the magistrate. These services are therefore best preserved distinct; yet particular circumstances may warrant exceptions. However, both magistrates and ministers should concur in leading people, by different means, to fear God, and honor the king, and to do justice, and shew kindness to their brethren. —It is very wrong for able men to get out of the way, when their help is wanted; but they should be sought out, and set to work: and as our end approaches, we should be more earnest to render our last services to mankind.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVII. V. 1—15. When David was not actually engaged in war, twenty-four thousand men seem to have been continually kept under military discipline. These were exchanged every month for others: so that two hundred and eighty-eight thousand men were, every year, exercised as a regular militia; but they were not 16 ¶ Furthermore over the tribes of Israel: the ruler of the Reubenites was Eliezer the son of Zichri: of the Simeonites, Shephatiah the son of Maachah:

17 Of the Levites, [a] Hashabiah the son of Kemuel: [b] of the Aaronites, Zadok:

18 Of Judah, [c] Elihu, one of the brethren of David: of Issachar, Omri the son of Michael:

19 Of Zebulun, Ishmaiah the son of Obadiah: of Naphtali, Jerimoth the son of Azriel:

20 Of the children of Ephraim, Hoshea the son of Azaziah: of the half-tribe of Manasseh, Joel the son of Pedaiah:

21 Of the half tribe of Manasseh in Gilead, [d] Iddo the son of Zechariah: of Benjamin, Jaasiel the son of [e] Abner:

22 Of Dan, Azareel the son of Jeroham. These were the princes of the tribes of Israel.

23 ¶ But David took not the number of them [f] from twenty years old and under: because the LORD had said [g] he would increase Israel like to the stars of the heavens.

24 Joab the son of Zeruiah [h] began to number, but he finished not, because there fell wrath for it against Israel; neither * was the number put in the account of the chronicles of king David.

25 And over [i] the king's treasures was Azmaveth the son of Adiel: and over [k] the store-houses in the fields, in the cities, and in the villages, and in the castles, was Jehonathan the son of Uzziah:

26 And over them that did the work of the field for tillage of the ground was Ezri the son of Chelub:

27 And over the vineyards was Shimei the Ramathite; over † the increase of the vineyards for the wine-cellars was Zabdi the Shiphmite:

28 And [l] over the olive-trees and the sycamore-trees that were in the low plains, was Baal-hanan the Gederite: and over the cellars of oil was Joash:

29 And over the herds that fed in [m] Sharon was Shitrai the Sharonite: and over the herds that were in the valleys was Shaphat the son of Adlai:

30 Over [n] the camels also was Obil [o] the Ishmaelite: and over the asses was Jehdeiah the Meronothite:

31 And over the flocks was Jaziz the Hagarite. All these were the rulers of the substance which was king David's.

32 Also Jonathan David's [p] uncle was a counsellor, a wise man, and a ‡ scribe: and Jehiel the § son of Hachmoni was with the king's sons:

33 And [q] Ahithophel was the king's counsellor: and [r] Hushai the Archite was the king's [s] companion:

34 And after Ahithophel was Jehoiada the son of Benaiah, and Abiathar: and [t] the general of the king's army was Joab.

kept from their other engagements, more than a month at one time. These were mustered from all the tribes of Israel, under commanders, called "captains of the companies, that ministered to the king by course." (28:1.) All the twelve captains are named among David's mighty men. (Marg. Ref.—11:10---47. 2 Sam. 23:8—39.) The word translated priest, and applied to Benaiah, evidently means, and should be rendered, Ruler, or officer. (Marg.)—Asahel, whom Abner slew, is numbered among these captains, and upon his death, his son succeeded him: hence we learn, that this order was at least begun to be established before David ruled over the whole land. (Note, 2 Sam. 2:18—23.)—Joab was the commander in chief. (34)

V. 16—22. These persons, called "the princes of the tribes," (28:1.) seem to have been civil rulers over their several tribes, not entirely unlike the lord lieutenants of counties in England.—Gad and Asher are not mentioned, probably because they were joined to the neighboring tribes. Elihu, or Eliab, was David's elder brother. The Levites had a prince, or rulers, as the other tribes had; and the family of Aaron, as distinguished from the rest, had Zadok, for their ruler, or prince. The son of Abner was, probably, advanced upon his father's death, as an expression of David's unfeigned concern for that event. (Notes, 2 Sam. 3:26—39.)

V. 23, 24. It seems probable, from this passage, that Joab began, by David's order, to number the children, as well as the grown men, but was prevented from finishing the account. (Notes, 2 Sam. 24:1—9.) The numbering of the effective men might have been deemed politically expedient: but ostentation alone could dictate the numbering of minors and infants; especially as God had pronounced the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, innumerable. (Marg. Ref.) 'An account 'of the number, as far as he went, was given by 'Joab to the king; but the king, being sensible of 'his error, would not have it recorded in the pub'lic registers of the kingdom, as other things of 'daily occurrence were.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 25—31. (Marg. Ref.) This account mentions only such persons, as filled up needful or useful stations; not any superfluous officers, retained merely to make a shew of magnificence. Luxury, ambition, and venality have multiplied these attendants on courts; and selfish opposers will so impede the most unexceptionable measures of government, in limited monarchies, that without a number of retainers whose interest it is to support the crown, the public business must move heavily, if it could at all proceed. Yet ancient simplicity was preferable to modern refinement; and the useful productions of the earth, to all the devices of luxury and indulgence. (Notes

CHAP. XXVIII.

David assembles the chiefs of Israel; shews them how his purpose of building a temple had been disallowed, and relates the LORD'S special favor to him; and his promises to Solomon, 1—8. He charges Solomon to know and serve God, and to build the temple, 9, 10. He gives a pattern for the form of the several parts, (as God had shewed it to him,) and gold and silver for the materials, 11—19. He encourages Solomon with the assurance of help, both from God, and from his people, 20, 21.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The prudent management of secular affairs is conducive to the interests of godliness; provided it be kept in its proper place, and the favor and glory of God have a decided preference. In the kingdoms of this world, habitual readiness for war forms a better security of peace, than any treaties or alliances: in like manner, nothing so much encourages Satan's assaults, as our unwatchfulness; and while we stand armed with "the whole armor of God," in the exercise of faith and preparation of heart for the conflict, we shall certainly be safe, and probably enjoy inward peace.—When we have exposed ourselves to wrath and chastening for our sins, we ought humbly to confess them and to desist from them: this will not make atonement for our crimes; but it is a preparation of heart from the Lord, for receiving the atonement made by the Savior, and making suitable returns for it.—Usefulness is the proper standard of valuableness: and he who estimates by this rule, will give the word of God, the salvation of Christ, and true religion, a decided preference to all other things, because infinitely more useful.—Well chosen counsellors prove the wisdom of princes: yet, some will be found wise men and scribes, and eminent for worldly policy and plausibility, who are in fact very wicked characters. But the faithful, the upright, and godly, should be our friends and chosen companions; and no king will be well advised in all things, or in those of the greatest importance, who does not make the testimonies of God "his delight and his counsellors;" however he may be surrounded by powerful family-connexions, faithful friends, and able politicians.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVIII. V. 1. This transaction seems to have occurred in the time of David's last sickness, which, notwithstanding remissions, he was aware would terminate in death. He therefore summoned the several descriptions of men, which were mentioned in the preceding chapter, and which formed a convention of the states, or representatives of the people; that he might declare to them the will of God as revealed to him, and engage them to a hearty concurrence in those public measures, which, in obedience to that will, he had resolved on.—Princes.] Note, 27:16—22.—Captains, &c.] 'That is, those great 'commanders of 24,000 apiece, mentioned in 'the beginning of the foregoing chapter.... V. 2. David, finding himself able, and being animated by the solemn occasion, stood up on his feet, to express his earnestness in this address, and his affection and respect for the people; and especially as intending to honor the Lord, by whose authority and commission he spake. Moses and Joshua had, just before their death, assembled the people for similar purposes. (Deut. 31:28—30. Notes, Deut. 32:45—52. Josh. 23: 24:)—David used the most endearing language in this parting interview, begging their attention, as his "brethren and his people."—The ark is here called "the footstool of our God." Heaven, where the Lord unveils his glories, is his throne; the earth is his footstool; and the place of the ark was, as it were, the centre of that footstool, where the gracious presence of God on earth was chiefly displayed, and before and toward which all his people worshipped. (Notes, Gen. 49:8—10.)

V. 7, 8. David had committed several great transgressions, and he every where speaks the language of conscious sinfulness. Yet the people had been preserved from idolatry, and retained in the worship and service of God, during his whole reign; and at this time they, as well as Solomon, appeared well disposed to true religion. If therefore they continued constant, "as at that day," to keep the Lord's commandments and judgments; their national covenant remaining unviolated, would secure their possession of Canaan and other important advantages. Yet they were exhorted not only to "keep," but "to seek for, all the commandments of the LORD;" that they might know them more exactly, and perform them more entirely. David therefore exhorted the princes to engage themselves to this, as "in the sight of all Israel, even the congregation of the LORD, and in the audience of their God," who was especially present in that solemn assembly; that they might be the more impressed, and that their example might have a salutary effect on others also.—'It 'is not enough to know the will of God, if we do 'not keep it; that is, observe his commands, and 'live in the practice of our duty. But that we 'may know it, it is necessary to seek it; that is, to 'inquire after it and to study the laws of God: 'for no man, as Grotius here observes, shall be 'excused by a supine ignorance.' Bp. Patrick. It is as necessary to pray humbly and continually for divine teaching, in "seeking the commandments of God," as to study the laws of God, and search the scriptures: for proud, and learned, and self-wise error, will no more excuse a man, than a supine ignorance. (Notes, Prov. 2:1—9.)

V. 9. The being and perfections of God are made known by his works, and by his word: and we ought diligently to seek the knowledge of him from both these sources. That discovery of some of the divine perfections, which may be made by studying the works of creation and providence, may be naturally delightful to man; because it gratifies his love of knowledge, and excites his surprise, without affronting his pride, alarming his conscience, or offending his prejudices. But revelation gives us the whole character of God, as connected with his natural perfections, and mysterious subsistence: and this not only in plain declarations, but in an historical and prophetical view of his providential government of the universe; in his holy law, "the ministration of condemnation and death;" and in his blessed gospel, "the ministration of righteousness and of the Spirit." (Note, 2 Cor. 3:7—11.) This knowledge of God the natural man cannot receive. (Note, 1 Cor. 2:14—16.) It implies the infinite justice and holiness of God, and the entire apostacy, rebellion, pollution, and misery of man; and shews every person on earth to be a criminal condemned to everlasting punishment, from which he cannot be delivered, except by the unmerited mercy of the Father, through the atonement of the Son and by the sanctification of the Holy Spirit. All men therefore oppose, neglect, or pervert this knowledge of God, except as they are taught by him. Some notions of these things may be attained by an unhumbled sinner: but he does not see them as they really are, according to their nature and value; and his ideas no more agree with the true meaning even of his own words than the words of a man born blind do with his ideas, when he speaks about light and colors. This knowledge therefore will have no effect unless a bad one, on the state of his heart, and the conduct of his life. But where God is truly known, he is also feared, believed, trusted, loved, worshipped, and obeyed, in proportion to that knowledge. Self-abasement, hatred of sin, indifference about worldly objects, and general benevolence from the purest principles, will uniformly attend and grow with it; and all true religion may be resolved into it. (Notes, Ps. 9:7—12, v. 10. 91:14—16. Jer. 24:7. 31:33,34 Matt. 11:27. John 17:1—3. 2 Cor. 4:3—6.)—This knowledge of God is, under the inward teaching and illuminating influence of the Spirit of truth, received by faith simply crediting "the testimony of God," and diligently appropriating the information which he communicates in Scripture. As far as acquired, it regulates the understanding, judgment, conscience, will, affections, and all the powers and operations of the soul; and consequently, all the intentions, dispositions, words, and actions. It brings a man acquainted with God in Christ, as a Father and Friend, in a way of experience and communion. It discovers what we may expect from him, and what he must approve or abhor in us; and consequently what is requisite to his saving sinners in a way that is honorable to his own great name, and to our being capable of happiness in his favor and service. Thus we learn the inestimable value of the Savior's atonement, and of the sanctification of the Holy Ghost, and are influenced to walk conscientiously in all his ordinances and commandments. It brings a sinner to his proper place, at the foot of the cross, and prostrate before the mercy-seat of a forgiving God; as a poor, helpless, lost sinner, an ignorant child, a humble suppliant, a condemned criminal, deserving nothing but wrath, yet expecting every thing needful or desirable, from the infinitely free mercy and grace of God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ. Having been forgiven much, and receiving much, the pardoned sinner learns to love much: and experiencing the blessed effects of this knowledge of God on his own soul, he declares its excellency to others, that they too may seek and find so inestimable a treasure.—Thus David had known the Lord; and having for many years feared, trusted, loved, and worshipped him, he was about to remove to that better world, where knowledge, holiness, love, and felicity are perfected: but before he departed, he desired to give it, as his dying counsel to his beloved Solomon, to cultivate the acquaintance of so kind, merciful, faithful, and powerful a Friend; (Note, Job 22:21—30.) and to "serve him with a perfect heart and a willing mind," or inward delight. But he also reminded him at the same time of the Lord's heart-searching knowledge, and of his justice and holiness, as well as of his mercy. (Marg. Ref. l.) A formal service therefore would not profit: if he sought God in a proper manner, he would be found of him; but if he finally renounced his service, he would "cast him off for ever," notwithstanding all his former kindness to him.

V. 10. Solomon was thus exhorted to be very circumspect, and attentive to the directions and commandments of God, in that important service to which he was called; yet not to be discouraged respecting it. 'Being a young man, he might be 'discouraged from undertaking so great a work: 'but he bids him go about it strenuously, because 'God had chosen him to do it.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 11—13. David was divinely instructed, probably by immediate revelation, or else by some prophet, (perhaps Nathan,) in what form the temple was to be built, and how to regulate every thing respecting it, and its chambers, and courts, and treasuries. (Notes, 9:22. 15:16. 16:1—3. 23:—26:) "The LORD made him understand it in writing by his hand upon him." (19) And in what way soever this writing was made and sent to him, he gave it to Solomon just before his death: so that nothing was left even to "the wisdom of Solomon," but all was done by rule, even to the quantity of metal used in each vessel. (Notes, 14—18.) Moses had been instructed in the same manner in erecting the tabernacle. For both the tabernacle and temple were typical of Christ, and heavenly things. (Notes, Ex. 25:9,40. 31:6.)—In vain do men of opposite sentiments contend for such uniformity in the circumstances of our worship, under the New Testament; seeing it is manifest, that exact, precise, and express rules are no where to be found, in respect of every particular.—It is, however, most evident, that to model divine ordinances according to man's imagination, would have been the height of presumption even in Solomon himself.

V. 14—16. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 1 Kings 7:48—51.) The candlesticks of silver, and tables of silver, are not elsewhere mentioned, and it is not known to what use they were put. 'The former' ... (the candlesticks of silver) 'were lesser, to be 'carried in their hands from place to place, as 'there was occasion.' Bp. Patrick. It seems there were in the temple several tables of gold for the shew-bread, and the vessels belonging to that part of the stated service. (Note, 2 Chr. 4:19.)

V. 18. Above the ark, between the cherubim, the glory of the Lord appeared, as a mighty warrior riding in his chariot of war, to the assistance of Israel his people. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Ex. 25: 10—21.) As the cherubim of gold made by Moses were joined to the mercy-seat, which covered the ark; it has been thought, that Solomon was directed to make two additional cherubim, after the same pattern. These must, however, be distinguished from those made of olive-trees covered with gold. (Note, 1 Kings 6:23—28.) And it is not absolutely certain, that amidst the many removals of the ark which had taken place, the cherubim had not been separated from it; and whether Solomon did any thing more than make two others in the stead of them.

V. 19. (Note, 11—13.) This comprises all the particulars, mentioned in the preceding verses.—'God made him to understand all this so 'plainly and distinctly, as if it had been written 'on his mind, as the ten commandments were 'upon the tables of stone in the mount.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 20, 21. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 10.) There appeared, in all the several orders of men, a very promising disposition to harmony among themselves, and loyalty to their prince; and David foresaw that God would dispose them to cordial obedience to Solomon, though a younger brother, and in his youth.—'This was one reason, no doubt, 'of calling this assembly together, that they might 'be engaged to be aiding to Solomon, in promot-'ing so pious a work.' Bp. Patrick.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

While life continues, it is desirable to spend it in promoting the peace, prosperity, and spiritual good, of those who may remain behind. (Notes, Ec. 9:10. 2 Pet. 1:12.—15.)—To treat inferiors with condescending respect and affection, is the way to gain love, without losing any due honor: and to address subjects as rational creatures, shewing them the propriety and advantage of proposed measures, and persuading them to a willing concurrence, is far preferable to the exercise of despotic authority. Indeed kings and their meanest subjects are all brethren in fallen Adam: and believers, on a throne or in a cottage, are all brethren in Jesus Christ, and should mutually seek each other's welfare.—In that monarchy, which God established in Israel and sanctioned by his approbation, we see no traces of the unalterable right of primogeniture, or of ruling with absolute authority. Rather we perceive a resemblance of that limited, moderate, and equitable authority, which a kind Providence has established over these kingdoms; for which we can never be sufficiently thankful, and for the continuance of which to our latest posterity, we should most fervently pray. The wickedness of man indeed and the experience of ages, have taught the friends of liberty to secure that blessing by many regulations, which were not thought of, nor needful, in the happy days of "the man after God's own heart:" and prudence dictates the general expediency of hereditary succession. Yet surely the conduct of David at the beginning, in the middle, and at the close of his reign, greatly resembled that of a British monarch meeting his Parliament, and doing all things by their concurrence and assistance.—It may be comfortable to us in a dying hour, to recollect the plans which we had framed to promote true religion, though we have been unable to accomplish them: from hence we may infer, that we are the chosen and called of God; as such designs prove, that he has given us a heart to account his service a delightful privilege, and to long and love to be employed in it. But, in the nature and measure of our services, we must learn acquiescence in his will, whose choice of us is the source of all our grace, comfort, or usefulness: he was pleased to make us Christians, or ministers, and to employ us in various ways; but he does not generally acquaint us with the reason of it. Happy are they, whom he has "chosen in Christ ... unto the adoption of children unto himself, according to the good pleasure of his will:" (Note, Eph. 1:3—8.) from their almighty Father they will "receive a kingdom that cannot be moved," and he will establish it to them for ever. And it will be manifest, that this is their felicity, by their constancy in keeping his commandments, and doing their proper work in his church, after the example and by the grace of the Savior. Let us then "give diligence to make our calling and election sure:" and, as in the presence of God, and in the sight of his people, let us "seek out that we may do all his commandments," sincerely, unreservedly, and in humble imitation of our perfect pattern. Let us seek the knowledge of God, as the most valuable of all treasures; and acquaint ourselves with him, as the God of all those in every age and nation, who "through faith and patience inherit the promises." Let us seek grace from him by earnest prayer, that we may serve him with an upright, undivided heart, and a willing, cheerful mind. Let us beware of hypocrisy; "for the Lord searcheth all hearts, and understandeth all the imaginations of the thoughts." Let us fear coming short, growing negligent, or turning aside; for "if we forsake him, he will cast us off for ever." But let us hope also in his mercy; for if we seek him he will be found of us: and we shall be strong in accomplishing the services to which we are called; we shall live in good measure in the enjoyment of our privileges, and may hope to leave them for an inheritance to our children. In this "fear of the LORD, there is strong confidence:" and by attaining to an assurance that we are his people, we may be assured also that he will not fail us nor forsake us; we may then bid defiance to all our enemies, and be of good courage in the prospect of difficulties and dangers.

CHAP. XXIX.

David shews the princes and people what treasures he had prepared for the building and service of the temple, 1—5. After his example, and at his exhortation, they offer liberally, 6—9. He adores and blesses God, and prays for the people and for Solomon, 10—19. The people worship, sacrifice, and feast with joy; and then make Solomon king the second time, 20—22. He reigns in majesty and prosperity, 23—25. David's long and prosperous reign, and happy death, 26—30.

FURTHERMORE, David the king said [a] unto all the congregation, Solomon my son, [b] whom alone God hath chosen, is yet [c] young and tender, and the work is great: [d] for the palace is not for man, but for the LORD God.

2 Now [e] I have prepared [f] with all my might for the house of my God: [g] the gold for things to be made of gold, and the silver for things of silver, and the brass for things of brass, the iron for things of iron, and wood for things of wood; [h] onyx-stones, and stones to be set, glistering stones, and of divers colors, and all manner of precious stones, and marble-stones in abundance.

3 Moreover, because [i] I have set my affection to the house of my God, [k] I have of mine own proper good, of gold and silver, which I have given to the house of my God, [l] over and above all that I have prepared for the holy house,

4 Even three thousand talents of gold, of the [m] gold of Ophir, and seven thousand talents of refined silver, to overlay the walls of the houses withal:

5 The gold for things of gold, and the silver for things of silver, and for all manner of work to be made by the hands of artificers. And [n] who then is willing to *consecrate his service this day unto the LORD?

6 Then [o] the chief of the fathers and princes of the tribes of Israel, and the captains of thousands and of hundreds, with the rulers of the king's work, offered willingly,

7 And gave for the service of the house of God, of gold five thousand talents and ten thousand drams, and of silver ten thousand talents, and of brass eighteen thousand talents, and one hundred thousand talents of iron.

8 And they with whom precious stones were found gave them to the treasure of the house of the LORD, by the hand of [p] Jehiel the Gershonite.

9 Then the people rejoiced, for that [q] they offered willingly; because with [r] perfect heart they offered willingly to the LORD: and [s] David the king also rejoiced with great joy.

V. 11—21.

If the Lord employ us and be with us, he will raise us up helpers, both willing and skilful, as far as we want them: and thus he will carry us through the duties of our several stations, and, these being finished, will receive us unto himself.—Nobles, ministers, and people should be wholly at the command of those rulers especially, who boldly and zealously endeavor to promote true religion; using their influence and authority to lead all their subjects to a willing attendance to things evidently scriptural, and of acknowledged excellence and importance.—But we should never forget, that the whole of the salvation for sinners, is of the Lord: the wondrous plan, the great and glorious Redeemer, and Redemption, and the revelation of it in the scriptures of truth; the way of access, the ministry of the gospel, the throne of grace also, the public ordinances, the sacramental seals, and every thing pertaining to our reconciliation and walk with God, are from him; and may not be modelled by human authority. Even mere circumstances, which must be regulated by man's discretion, and in which every society has a right to judge for its willing members, are not to be imposed on our brethren: and we are accountable to God, though not to man, for that judgment and practice which we ourselves form and adopt. We should therefore in every thing be circumspect, and not leave the Scripture in any particular, where it affords us directions; yet we should not endanger the peace of the church, for the sake of minute external regulations. Hitherto much has been amiss in every age, in every state, and in every division of the church: ere long our Prince of Peace, the Builder of the true temple, the Son of God, will come, and set all right. In the mean time let us judge for ourselves, and bear with each other; let us cease from self-confident boastings, and acrimonious controversies; and, in our several places, let us endeavor to serve God, and to help one another, and to promote the common cause of truth and holiness.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIX. V. 1. Whom alone God, &c.] David by this expression declared, that God had chosen Solomon in preference to the rest of his sons; and that this was the sole reason of his succession to the throne, and not any partial affection of his own towards him. This would tend to satisfy the people, and to induce David's other sons to submit to the divine appointment. (Notes, 22:2—10.)

V. 2. The peculiar use made of the precious stones of various kinds, mentioned in this verse, in decorating the temple, or in adding to the magnificence of the service there performed, is not known. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3—9. David seems to have dedicated a certain proportion of all his spoils and gains to God, before he considered the residue as his own; and this proportion constituted the treasure before spoken of; (22:14.) but besides this, he gave, from his own treasury, about eighteen millions sterling of gold and silver. This he offered, not by constraint, or from ostentation; but because "he had set his affection to the house of his God," and thought he could never do enough towards promoting that good work. He was likewise desirous to see his subjects "abound in this grace also;" as they had been enriched by his victories, and never burdened with taxes: and he knew that it would be "fruit, which would abound to their own account." Having set them the example, he only inquired who was willing to assist, and to consecrate his service unto the Lord, by contributing part of his wealth to that holy use: and immediately they offered about thirty millions of gold and silver, besides brass, iron, and precious stones; and instead of grudging the expense, the king and people all rejoiced together; for they were cordial in it, and offered willingly themselves, and rejoiced to see all the others offering with the same liberality.—The prosperity of Israel must have been immense, under the reign of David; and it seems that there was also much true piety among the people, especially towards the close of his reign. We can scarcely form a conception of the magnificence of the temple and adjacent edifices, about which such immense quantities of gold and silver were employed. (Note, Ez. 41:22.) But "the unsearchable riches of Christ" excel the splendor of the temple, infinitely more than that surpassed the meanest cottage on earth.—The refined silver seems to have been used, in covering the inner walls of the chambers and other out-buildings; for those of the temple itself were plated with gold. V. 10—19. Instead of boasting of these extraordinary oblations; (Note, Num. 23:4—6.) Davi gave solemn thanks to the Lord, with much en largement of heart and copiousness of expression —"LORD, God of Israel, our Father," may mean either the 'God of our father Israel, or Jacob; (18) or, 'JEHOVAH our Father, the God of Israel. In this last view, the words may be considered, a the first instance in Scripture, of God being ad dressed in prayer, as "Our Father." (Note, Matt 6:9.) This is properly the language of the Spirit o adoption. (Note, Rom. 8:14—17.) every glorious and adorable perfection, and exercises almighty power and absolute universal authority; and who, victorious over all his enemies, reigns in majesty which exceeds all description or imagination! for his "is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory for ever, Amen." (Note, Matt. 6:13.) From this God alone, David had received his wealth, his honor, and power: this he acknowledged with grateful praise; but, contemplating the infinite glories of his great Benefactor, and then turning his thoughts to himself and his people, the comparison affected him with a deep conviction of their meanness, weakness, and unworthiness; and he could not but wonder, that the glorious God would condescend to notice such indigent and sinful creatures. "LORD," says he, "what are we, that we should offer so willingly after this sort!" Their existence was derived from God: he had graciously given them these treasures, and had disposed their hearts willingly to make this use of them; so that in every way the whole praise belonged to him. 'In the Targum it is thus paraphrased, Who hast given us such plenty, that we are able to offer these gifts. He should have added, and also given us an heart to part with them for thy service. ... The highest satisfaction was, that God had bestowed upon him an heart, to do what he had done, willingly, with a sincere respect to the service of God, and not out of vain glory.' Bp. Patrick. (Note, Ps. 110:3.) As for David and his people, they were strangers and sojourners; dying, because sinful creatures. Though settled and prospered very greatly in Canaan, they still were strangers before God, and sojourners, as really, (though in rather a different sense,) as their fathers were, when they dwelt in the promised land in tents, or wandered in the desert. (Notes, Ps. 39:12. Heb. 4:3—11. 11:13—16. 1 Pet. 2:11.) Indeed all that treasure, which they gave to the Lord to build his temple, was his own before; if they had attempted to keep it, death would soon have removed them: so that the only use, which they could make of it, to their own real advantage, was thus to consecrate it to the service of him who gave it, and whose gracious acceptance of their oblation would add still more to their obligations. At the same time David was conscious of his own uprightness and willingness in this oblation, as in the presence of that heart-searching God who "hath pleasure in uprightness;" and with great joy he beheld his people shewing every token of the same disposition. He well knew, that this, as far as genuine, was the effect of a sacred influence from God upon the heart, 'preventing them, that they might have 'a good will:' and he most fervently prayed, that it might be evermore kept there, by the same grace 'working in them when they had that good 'will:' and that the Lord would prepare the hearts of them all, but especially the heart of Solomon, for himself; and that he might accomplish the arduous important service before him.—Such is this address of David to the LORD God of Israel; and nothing on this side heaven can be conceived, more humble, pure, evangelical, spiritual, devout, or exalted, than the praise, adoration, gratitude, confidence, love, zeal, and philanthropy, which it breathes throughout.—None abiding. (15) No expectation. (Marg.) Notes, Ps. 39:7,8. 62:1,2,5—7.

V. 21—25. Besides the burnt-offerings, which were entirely consumed on the altar, numerous peace-offerings were sacrificed, on the flesh of which the assembled multitudes joyfully feasted. (Notes, Deut. 12:5—7. 1 Kings 8:63—65. Neh. 8:10—12.)—Solomon had been hastily, and by a few persons, anointed king, during Adonijah's usurpation; (Notes, 1 Kings 1:38,39.) but he was at this time anointed in a more solemn and public manner. As Abiathar was removed from the high priesthood, and Zadok substituted in his place, after David's death; it has been thought, that the second anointing of Solomon was also subsequent to that event. (Note, 1 Kings 2:26,27.) He was anointed unto "the LORD to be the chief governor," and "he sat on the throne of the LORD." For the LORD was in an especial manner the king of Israel; the princes received their authority from him by peculiar designation; and they were expressly required to support his worship and law. They also were all types of Christ, who "sat down with his Father on his throne."—We may suppose that every kind of personal accomplishment united with justice, wisdom, and prosperity, in that royal majesty which the Lord bestowed upon Solomon, and by which he magnified him in the sight of all Israel. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 26—28. (Marg. Ref.) When we read the eleventh chapter of the second book of Samuel, and the sequel of that melancholy narration, we could scarcely expect to behold David appear so illustrious in his closing scene, in which every thing heavenly and excellent is combined; and the people seem to have considered him with a veneration and affection, which language fails to express. But his repentance had been as remarkable as his sins; and his conduct, during his afflictions, and towards the end of his life, seems to have had more effect on his subjects, than all that they had before witnessed.—It is indeed hard to say, which shines the brightest in this chapter, the rising, or the setting sun: but it is better to rise behind clouds, and to be much obscured in the course of our lives, and to set, like David, with splendor; than with Solomon to rise very bright, and shine very splendid, and then to set behind an almost impenetrable cloud. (Note, 1 Kings 11:42,43.)

V. 29, 30. It is plain from these verses, that the contemporary prophets were the historians, or annalists, of God's people; and that they left far more copious records of public transactions, both in respect of Israel and the adjacent countries, than have come down to us. (Note, 2 Sam. 24:11.)—Learned men may indeed regret the loss of these histories; but 'God knows better than we, 'what was most fit to be preserved for the use and 'benefit of his church.' Bp. Patrick.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

The due support and scriptural promotion of religion, is always more important, and in many cases more arduous, than the administration of civil government: because the honor of God, and the most essential interests of immortal souls, are concerned in it; compared with which all other interests are trivial. They alone, whom the Lord hath chosen for such a work, will prosper in it; and it is the duty of all to assist by every proper means in their power.—Strong affection to God, and to all that relates to him for his sake, will constrain men to the most disinterested, self-denying, and liberal services; and they will never think, that they have done, or can do, enough to promote his glory; but, with all their might, will abound in every good work, and make more and more preparation for the carrying on of the same great and holy design. (Note, 2 Cor. 5:13—15.)—Those who would excite others to consecrate their service to the Lord, either in feeding his poor children, or in spreading his truth and supporting his worship, must set the example: and then a hint from them will go further, than a labored and eloquent oration from a man, who persuades others to those things, which he himself evidently does not practise.—Our holy joy in God will commonly bear proportion to the willingness, uprightness, and liberality, with which we devote our all to him: and that rejoicing is peculiarly pure and heavenly, which springs from beholding those whom we greatly love, giving evidence of their real devotedness to God, and their delight in his ways. (Notes, Phil. 4:14—20. 1 Thes. 3:6—10. 2 John 4. 3 John 1—4.) The bodily pain and infirmities of age, and the chilling hand of death, while they indispose us for all other enjoyments, or separate us from them, cannot preclude or extinguish this, which emulates that of angels, who "rejoice over one sinner that repenteth."

V. 10—19.

Those, who are most "zealous of good works," will never boast of them, or trust in them. Sensible of their indigence as creatures, and conscious of their guilt and defilement as sinners, they will allow that "it is of the LORD's mercies they are not consumed." To them it appears an unspeakable favor, that a holy God will accept any worship or service from such polluted creatures; they know that all their ability of every kind is from him; and they account it their chief pleasure, honor, and privilege to be employed by him, who needs not and cannot be profited by their services. They are conscious that their best needs forgiveness, falls infinitely beneath his glorious majesty, and is utterly unworthy of his acceptance, "whose is the kingdom, and who is exalted as Head above all." 'In 'like manner, we ought to acknowledge God in all 'spiritual things: referring every good thought, 'good purpose, good work, to his divine grace, 'from whom we receive it; beseeching him, as 'David doth, ... to preserve it in us.' Bp. Patrick. Thus our best and most useful works will terminate in admiration of his inconceivable majesty, goodness, power, and holiness; in unfeigned praises and thanksgivings; and in the deepest self-abasement before him. This is genuine grace: but when we are proud of our services, (which we are very prone to be,) what is it, but sacrilegiously to rob God of what belongs to him alone, and sacrifice it to the most hateful of our own lusts? We may indeed "rejoice in the testimony of our consciences," when we have acted with "simplicity and godly sincerity," in the presence of that God who trieth the heart, and hath pleasure in uprightness; (Note, 2 Cor. 1:12—14.) and should joyfully observe the indications of the same disposition in others: but we must remember, that this also is the gift of God, and that we can no more offer the sacrifice of a broken heart, or a thankful heart, than we can present ten thousands of bulls and goats, except as we give unto him his own, which he has previously conferred upon us. All comes from him, and to him belongs "the kingdom, and the power, and the glory for ever."—While we bless the Lord for putting good desires into our hearts, or the hearts of others, we should never forget to pray to him to preserve and fix them there, and to bring them to good effect.—When we feel that there is no abiding for us on earth, but that we are departing as a shadow, and following our fathers, who have been strangers and sojourners before us; we should be peculiarly fervent in our prayers that those who are to succeed us, or whom we consider as having profited by our instructions, may have their "hearts prepared unto the LORD," and disposed for the work to which they are called. Parents and ministers also, when they perceive any of their children or people under serious impressions, should "travail in birth for them till Christ be formed in them," by earnest constant prayer, that "the LORD would keep for ever in the imaginations of the thoughts of their hearts," those good desires which he has excited, "and prepare their hearts unto himself." (Notes, Gal. 4:17—20. Col. 2:1—4.) We should also call upon them to pray and to bless the Lord for themselves: and when our examples prove that we are deeply in earnest in these great concerns, we may hope that our exhortations will have a permanent and most beneficial effect.

V. 20—30.

They, who render God the honor due unto his name, will seldom fail duly to respect those, who have been the instruments of his kindness to them, or to honor those whom God has placed in authority over them.—All our obedience and communion with God must have a believing reference to that one great sacrifice, which infinitely more honors his law and justice, than all the oblations which shadowed it forth to ancient believers: thus, peace with him, peace of conscience, and gladness of heart will make sacred ordinances pleasant to us; and even render our ordinary meals subservient to our spiritual improvement and the honor of God; while they are attended with gratitude, temperance, liberality, and a heavenly mind. These are the pleasures and employments, which add dignity to prosperity, rank, and eminence for wisdom; which adorn every personal accomplishment, and increase the enjoyment of sprightly youth and vigorous health. These are essential to that royal majesty, which God bestows on those whom he loves: and without these there can be no durable prosperity, honor, comfort, or usefulness. Unless we have some acquaintance with these pious exercises, riches, honor, and prosperity only render "the king of terrors" more tremendous; but these are sufficient to deprive death of his sting: and when we read or hear of one, who has been taken away from the midst of such employments, we readily conceive of his soul, as escaped out of prison, mounting up to heaven, and joining immediately with ineffable delight in the worship of angels. May we "die the death of the righteous, and may our latter end be like his!" Blessed be God, the chief of sinners may hope for such a glorious exit, when brought to repent, and to flee for refuge to the Savior's atoning blood. Nay, even those who have grievously sinned, after a long profession of godliness, to the triumphing of the wicked, and so as to bring on themselves the most severe and complicated chastisements, may possibly retrieve all; may have their broken bones made to rejoice; may recover "the joy of God's salvation;" may "have their lips opened to shew forth his praises, that sinners may be converted unto him;" and may regain the entire confidence of those, who had been the most stumbled by their fall. (Notes, Ps. 51: title. 11—13.) But this can not be done without deep humiliation before God and man, resigned patience under correction, and redoubled watchfulness and diligence in the Lord's ways. Let us then mark the difference between the spirit and character of the man after God's own heart, living and dying; and those of such worthless professors, as resemble him in nothing but his sin, and who apologize for their crimes by his example. Let us also compare him with those presumptuous cavillers, who profanely carp at the blemishes in illustrious scriptural characters; but never raise their minds to an idea of such exalted excellency, piety, and philanthropy, as David shewed. We cannot too closely imitate the general example of this most eminent saint: but let us watch and pray, lest we be overcome by temptation and overtaken with sin, to the dishonor of God, and the wounding of our own consciences: and if we have offended, let us copy his example of repentance and patience, still hoping to close our days like him; and, having "served our own generation by the will of God," to fall asleep, with the sure and certain hope of a glorious resurrection, through our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Amen.

THE SECOND BOOK OF THE CHRONICLES.

THIS book is a continuation of the history, begun in the former book. It in some respects coincides with the books of Kings. But there, the histories of Judah and Israel are carried on together; as those of England and Scotland are by some of our historians: here, the affairs of Judah are more fully and distinctly recorded, while those of Israel are only mentioned occasionally, when required by the main subject; as an English historian would sometimes digress concerning the affairs of France or Germany, in elucidating his narrative. 'There are several things 'contained in this book, of which no mention is made there,' (in Kings,) 'particularly in the 'history of Jehoshaphat and Hezekiah: and many other things there mentioned, are here more 'fully and clearly explained, as will be observed in the acts of Abijah, Asa, Joash, and other kings 'of Judah.' Bp. Patrick.—The history opens with the accession of Solomon, and contains a narrative of the several kings of his race, who reigned in succession, till the Babylonish captivity; and it concludes with an intimation of Cyrus's decree for the restoration of the Jews and the rebuilding of the temple, about four hundred and eighty years after.—Besides the additional practical instruction here afforded, especially in respect of the different effects of piety, or profaneness, in the affairs of nations favored with revelation; this history throws great light on the prophetical writings, which can by no means be well understood without constantly adverting to it. The prophecies contained in it, either were fulfilled soon after they were spoken, or coincide with those before considered: and it is not always easy to determine concerning subsequent scriptural references, whether they relate to this book or to the books of Kings.

CHAP. I.

Solomon, established as king, calls on his nobles and people, to join in sacrificing at Gibeon, 1—6. The Lord appears to him there by night, and allows him to choose what blessing to ask: he asks wisdom, and is promised also riches and honor, 7—12. Solomon's forces, riches, and commerce, 13—17.

AND Solomon the son of David [a] was strengthened in his kingdom; and [b] the LORD his God was with him, and [c] magnified him exceedingly.

2 Then Solomon spake unto all Israel, [d] to the captains of thousands and of hundreds, and to the judges, and to every governor in all Israel, [e] the chief of the fathers.

3 So Solomon and all the congregation with him, went to the high place that was at [f] Gibeon; for there was [g] the tabernacle of the congregation of God, which Moses [h] the servant of the LORD had made in the wilderness.

B. C. 1045. 4 But [i] the ark of God had David brought up from Kirjath-jearim, to the place which David had prepared for it: [k] for he had pitched a tent for it at Jerusalem.

5 Moreover, [l] the brazen altar that [m] Bezaleel the son of Uri, the son of Hur, had made, * he put before the tabernacle of the LORD: and Solomon and the congregation sought unto it.

6 And Solomon went up thither to the brazen altar before the LORD, which was at the tabernacle of the congregation, and offered [n] a thousand burnt-offerings upon it.

7 [o] In that night did God appear unto Solomon, and said unto him, [p] Ask what I shall give thee.

8 And Solomon said unto God, [q] Thou hast shewed great mercy unto David my father, and hast made me [r] to reign in his stead.

9 Now, O LORD God, [s] let thy promise unto David my father be established; for thou hast made me king over a people, [t] like the dust of the earth in multitude.

10 [t] Give me now wisdom and knowledge, that I may [u] go out and come in before this people: [x] for who can judge this thy people that is so great?

11 And God said to Solomon, Because [y] this was in thine heart, and thou hast not asked riches, wealth, or honor, nor the life of thine enemies, neither yet hast asked long life; but hast asked wisdom and knowledge for thyself, [z] that thou mayest judge my people, over whom I have made thee king;

12 Wisdom and knowledge is granted unto thee: and [a] I will give thee riches, and wealth, and honor, [b] such as none of the kings have had, that have been before thee, neither shall there any after thee have the like.

13 ¶ Then Solomon came from his journey to the high place that was [c] at Gibeon to Jerusalem, from before the tabernacle of the congregation, and [d] reigned over Israel.

14 And [e] Solomon gathered chariots and horsemen: and he had a thousand and four hundred chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen, which he placed in the chariot-cities, and with the king at Jerusalem.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1. Note, 1 Chr. 29:21—25.

V. 2. This seems to have taken place a short time after David's decease; when Solomon, being established in his kingdom, convened his chief men, and spake to them concerning the solemn sacrifice, in honor of God, which he purposed to offer.

V. 3—6. Notes, Ex. 40:1—33. 2 Sam. 6: 1 Kings 3:4 8:4. 1 Chr. 16:37—43. 21:28—30. 22:1.

V. 7—12. Note, 1 Kings 3:5—14.—This was in thine heart. (11) This does not occur in Kings: and it implies that the request of Solomon, as arising from a spiritual judgment and heart, was peculiarly acceptable to that God, who searches, regards, and demands the heart. God promised Solomon all the things which he had not asked, except the life of his enemies: but he was to be a peaceable king, a type of the Prince of peace. (12)

15 And [f] the king * made silver and gold at Jerusalem as plenteous as stones, and cedar-trees made he as the [g] sycamore-trees that are in the vale for abundance.

16 And † Solomon had horses brought out of Egypt, and linen yarn: the king's merchants received the linen yarn at a price.

17 And they fetched up, and brought forth out of Egypt, a chariot for six hundred shekels of silver, and an horse for an hundred and fifty: and so brought they out horses for all [h] the kings of the Hittites, and for the kings of Syria, by their ‡ means.

CHAP. II.

Solomon purposes to build the temple, and a palace, 1. His workmen, 2. He sends to Huram for skilful artificers, and for timber, 3—10. Huram's friendly answer, 11—16. Solomon employs strangers, as laborers and overseers, 17, 18.

AND Solomon [a] determined to build an house [b] for the name of the LORD, and [c] an house for his kingdom.

2 And Solomon [d] told out threescore and ten thousand men to bear burdens, and fourscore thousand to hew in the mountain, and three thousand and six hundred to oversee them.

3 And Solomon sent to [e] Huram the king of Tyre, saying, [f] As thou didst deal with David my father, and didst send him cedars to build him an house to dwell therein, even so deal with me.

4 Behold, [g] I build an house to the name of the LORD my God, [h] to dedicate it to him, and [i] to burn before him * sweet incense, and for [k] the continual shewbread, and for [l] the burnt-offerings morning and evening, on the sabbaths, and on the new moons, and on [m] the solemn feasts of the LORD our God. This is an ordinance for ever to Israel.

5 And the house which I build is [n] great: for [o] great is our God above all gods.

6 But [p] who is † able to build him an house, seeing the heaven and heaven of heavens cannot contain him? [q] who am I then, that I should build him an house, [r] save only to burn sacrifice before him?

7 Send me now therefore a man [s] cunning to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass, and in iron, and in purple, and crimson, and blue, and that can skill ‡ to grave with the cunning men that are with me in Judah and in Jerusalem, [t] whom David my father did provide.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The presence and blessing of God give strength, honor, happiness, and stability; and to whom he has given much, from them he requires the more.—It would be a comely sight to the spiritually minded, to behold kings with their nobles, and the chief estates of their dominions, assembling together for the purposes of religious worship, stirring up each other by the fervency of their devotions, and giving evident demonstrations how generally and deeply their hearts were engaged in the sacred services. Alas! even in Christian countries such scenes are seldom, if ever, exhibited! But the example, the influence, and the exhortations of princes, who greatly fear and love the Lord, and who are eminent for piety and wisdom, may effect very great things; especially when one succeeds to another, walking before God, in the steps of his predecessor: and those, who love the truths and service of God, should unite in praying, not formally, but fervently, for all in authority; that, being enriched with grace and wisdom, they may become instruments of extensive good to their dominions.—To us the desires of men's hearts can only be known by their habitual conduct; but in themselves they as certainly distinguish characters, as actions do: and if the Lord see, that it is in our heart to desire wisdom and grace, more than riches, honor, or pleasure, he will delight to fulfil all our mind. His promises should form the rule and measure of our prayers: and when they respect any important end, they may be pleaded as engaging him to grant all things requisite in order to it.—To know and to do our duty in the station of life assigned us, to the glory of God and the benefit of our connexions in society, requires much wisdom, and is one principal exercise and evidence of it: and if we humbly feel our need of this wisdom, and faithfully ask it of God, he will give it liberally, and not upbraid our former folly. (Note, Jam. 1:5—8.)—Those secular employments which are commenced by the worship and service of God, are likely to be well managed and to be prosperous: and as he "gives grace and glory; so he will withhold no good thing from them that walk uprightly."—But alas! prosperity is always dangerous, because our hearts are extremely deceitful: and it is with great propriety, that we pray, 'in all time of our wealth, .. 'Good Lord deliver us,' from pride, ostentation indolence, self-indulgence, and a worldly mind Let us then improve our present talent, seek heavenly blessings, and be contented without those great things, which men generally covet but which commonly prove fatal snares to their souls.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. Marg. Ref—Note, 1 Kings 5:13—18

know that thy servants can skill to cut timber in Lebanon: and behold, my servants shall be with thy servants, 9 Even to prepare me timber in abundance: for the house which I am about to build shall be * wonderful great.

10 And, behold, [y] I will give to thy servants, the hewers that cut timber, twenty thousand measures of beaten wheat, and twenty thousand measures of barley, and twenty thousand [z] baths of wine, and twenty thousand baths of oil.

11 ¶ Then Huram the king of Tyre answered in writing, which he sent to Solomon, [a] Because the LORD hath loved his people, he hath made thee king over them.

12 [b] Huram said moreover, Blessed be the LORD God of Israel, [c] that made heaven and earth, who hath given to David the king a wise son, [†] endued with prudence and understanding, that might build [d] an house for the LORD, and an house for his kingdom.

13 And now I have sent a cunning man, endued with understanding, [e] of Huram my father's,

14 [f] The son of a woman of the daughters of Dan, and his father was a man of Tyre, [g] skilful to work in gold, and in silver, in brass, in iron, in stone, and in timber, in purple, in blue, and in fine linen, and in crimson; also to grave any manner of graving, and to find out every device which shall be put to him, with thy cunning men, and with the cunning men of my lord David thy father.

15 Now therefore the wheat, and the barley, the oil, and the wine, [h] which my lord hath spoken of, let him send unto his servants:

16 And [i] we will cut wood out of Lebanon, [‡] as much as thou shalt need; and we will bring it to thee in floats by sea to [§] Joppa, and thou shalt carry it up to Jerusalem.

17 And Solomon [k] numbered all [‖] the strangers that were in the land of Israel, [l] after the numbering wherewith David his father had numbered them; and they were found an hundred and fifty thousand, and three thousand and six hundred.

18 And he set [m] threescore and ten thousand of them to be bearers of burdens, and fourscore thousand to be hewers in the mountain, and three thousand and six hundred overseers to set the people a-work.

V. 3—10. We have here a more particular account of Solomon's message to Huram, (or Hiram,) king of Tyre, than was before given; (Notes, 1 Kings 5:1—11.) and it appears, that he thought it no impropriety to speak freely and particularly on religious subjects, in treating with a heathen prince about secular business. On the contrary, he labored to give him very high and honorable thoughts of Israel's God, as great above all gods, and as one whom "the heaven of heavens could not contain:" he particularly explained to him his intentions in building a temple to the name of the Lord; viz. that it was to be the stated place of those instituted ordinances, which were required by the law of God, given to Israel; that he might not misapprehend him, as if he supposed that JEHOVAH could be circumscribed in a temple, like the idols of the heathen: and he represented to him his own inability and unworthiness for such a service, except as mercifully assisted and accepted in it, by that gracious God, who had chosen him for the work. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11, 12. The just sentiments contained in these verses, with the pious and benevolent spirit which they breathe, leave no doubt, that Huram was himself a spiritual worshipper of the true God. (Note, 1 Kings 10:6—9.) 'He ... owns 'the God of Israel to be JEHOVAH, the Maker of 'heaven and earth. ... The Israelites, ... when they 'would distinguish him from idols and creatures, '... confess him to be the Creator of the world. ... 'And ... he' (Huram) 'congratulates the Israelites 'on the happiness they enjoyed under such a king, 'which was the effect of his love to God and his 'church.' Victorinus Strigelius in Bp. Patrick.

V. 13. Of Huram my father's.] Or, Huram-abi. It seems that this man, being the most eminent in his line of business, was called father, or my father Huram. King Huram called him so, and Solomon did the same. (Note, 4:16.) For it is evident that the artist's name is here meant, and not that of the king's father.

V. 14—16. Marg. Ref.—Note, 1 Kings 7:14. —My lord David. (14) An honorable title given by Huram to David, expressive of his veneration and affection for him: for, probably, he had derived his knowledge of the true God, and of his holy worship, from his intercourse with David, to whom on that account he looked up, as to a superior.

V. 17, 18. Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1 Kings 5:13—18. 9:20—22.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We ought always to attend to the work of God in decided preference to our own indulgence or accommodation: and our hearts should be resolved for every service, that we may endure hardship, struggle with difficulties, and not yield to weariness or discouragement.—The greatest monarchs on earth are as nothing, in comparison with the God of heaven; and they should deem it their highest honor to be his servants, and to speak of his glorious majesty.—The genuine love of God abounding in the heart, infuses the savor of piety into the ordinary concerns and converse of life

The place of the temple, and the time when the building of it was begun, 1, 2. Its dimensions and ornaments, 3—7. Those of the most holy place, 8—10. The cherubim placed in it, 11—13. The veil, 14. The two pillars, 15—17.

THEN [a] Solomon began to build the house of the LORD at Jerusalem [b] in mount Moriah, *where the LORD appeared unto David his father, in the place that David had prepared in the threshing-floor of [c] Ornan the Jebusite.

2 And he began to build [d] in the second day of the second month, in the fourth year of his reign.

3 ¶ Now these are the things wherein [e] Solomon was †instructed for the building of the house of God. [f] The length by cubits after the first measure was threescore cubits, and the breadth twenty cubits.

4 And the porch that was in the front of the house, the length of it was according to the breadth of the house, twenty cubits, and the height was an hundred and twenty: and he overlaid it within with pure gold.

5 And [g] the greater house he ceiled with fir-tree, which he overlaid with fine gold, and set thereon palm-trees and chains.

6 And he ‡ garnished the house with [h] precious stones for beauty: and the gold was gold of Parvaim.

7 He [i] overlaid also the house, the beams, the posts, and the walls thereof, and the doors thereof, with gold; and [k] graved cherubims on the walls.

8 And he made [l] the most holy house, the length whereof was according to the breadth of the house, twenty cubits, and the breadth thereof twenty cubits: and he overlaid it with fine gold, amounting to six hundred talents.

9 And the weight of the nails was fifty shekels of gold. And he overlaid the upper chambers with gold.

10 And in the most holy house he made [m] two cherubims of §image-work, and overlaid them with gold.

11 And the wings of the cherubims were twenty cubits long: one wing of the one cherub was five cubits reaching to the wall of the house; and the other wing was likewise five cubits, reaching to the wing of the other cherub.

12 And one wing of the other cherub was five cubits, reaching to the wall of the house; and the other wing was five cubits also joining to the wing of the other cherub.

13 The wings of these cherubims spread themselves forth twenty cubits:

ndeed, we should be neither afraid nor ashamed, o embrace every opportunity of speaking honorbly of him, and of impressing the minds of men vith a deep sense of his majesty and excellency, nd of the importance of his favor, worship, and ervice. (Note, Ps. 119:46.)—It is a great part of ur "wisdom towards them that are without," so o explain our meaning in every doctrine and ordinance, and so to guard our discourses about hem, as may best prevent misapprehension or rejudice: and the neglect of this rule is not boldess or faithfulness, as some well meaning zealots uppose, but indiscretion and folly.—In pleading he cause of God and religion, we should always peak humbly of ourselves: but, unless we be umbled, our temper and conduct will betray the ypocrisy of our self-abasing language. May the ord himself therefore "clothe us with humility!" —Possessions, endowments, or royal authority, are iven men for the sake of others; and a wise and ious king is an evidence of the Lord's special ove to the people. Who then can express the reatness of his love to his people, in giving them is only begotten Son, to be their Prince and Savior! It is also a great mercy to have children ndued with wisdom and understanding: and we ould all desire to be blessings to those among vhom we live, that they may bless God for us. Ve ought also to praise him for those blessings vhich are exclusively bestowed on others: and it s pleasant to observe how the friendship of pious nen becomes the means of bringing those who vere far off, to know, love, and worship our God nd Savior. Let us then be unwearied in spreading the knowledge of his name and truth; and let us devote our several talents to his service; endeavor to be helpful to one another in this good work; and be thankful that poor heathens, and even the meanest slaves, may be usefully and acceptably employed by our great and gracious Lord!

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1, 2. (Notes, Gen. 22:2. 1 Chr. 21:18—30. 22:1.) It is thought, that the temple and its courts were situated, partly in the lot of Judah, and partly in that of Benjamin. (Notes, Deut. 33:12. Ps. 78:67—69.)—Began to build, &c. (2) Note, 1 Kings 6:1.

V. 3, 4. "The first measure" seems to mean the original plan. 'He projected the sanctuary, and 'the oracle, both together; and in their first de'scription they were to be in length sixty cubits: 'that is, forty for the sanctuary, and twenty for the 'most holy place.' Bp. Patrick. The height of the porch is not mentioned in Kings; but the description given of the temple, in the exposition, takes in this account. (Notes, 1 Kings 6:2,3. 1 Chr. 28:11—13,19.)

V. 6—8. (Marg. Ref.) It is not known on what account the gold, here mentioned, is called gold of Parvaim; that word not elsewhere occurring in Scripture: probably it was brought from a place so called.

V. 9. Some by the word rendered "the upper chambers," suppose the ceiling of the most holy place to be meant; but perhaps some of the upper chambers, on the outside of the temple, were thus decorated; the lower being used for more common purposes. (Notes 1 Kings 5:5—10.)

and they stood on their feet, and their faces were * inward.

14 ¶ And he made [n] the veil of blue, and purple, and crimson, and fine linen, and [†] wrought cherubims thereon.

15 Also he made before the house [o] two pillars of thirty and five cubits [‡] high, and the chapiter that was on the top of each of them was five cubits.

16 And he made [p] chains, as in the oracle, and put them on the heads of the pillars; and made [q] an hundred pomegranates, and put them on the chains.

17 And he [r] reared up the pillars before the temple, one on the right hand, and the other on the left; and called the name of that on the right hand [§] Jachin, and the name of that on the left [‖] Boaz.

CHAP. IV.

The altar of brass, 1. The molten sea supported by twelve oxen, 2—5. The lavers, candlesticks, and tables, 6—8. The two courts of the temple, 9, 10. The vessels, furniture, and instruments of brass, 11—18. Those of gold, 19—22.

MOREOVER, he made [a] an altar of brass, twenty cubits the length thereof, and twenty cubits the breadth thereof, and ten cubits the height thereof.

2 Also he made [b] a molten sea of ten cubits from * brim to brim, round in compass, and five cubits the height thereof; and a line of thirty cubits did compass it round about.

3 And under it was [c] the similitude of oxen, which did compass it round about: ten in a cubit, compassing the sea round about. Two rows of oxen were cast, when it was cast.

4 It [d] stood upon twelve oxen, [e] three looking toward the north, and three looking toward the west, and three looking toward the south, and three looking toward the east: and the sea was set above upon them, and all their hinder parts were inward.

5 And the thickness of it was an handbreadth, and the brim of it like the work of the brim of a cup, [†] with flowers of lilies: and it received and held [f] three thousand baths.

6 He made also [g] ten lavers, and put five on the right hand, and five on the left, to wash in them: [‡] such things as they offered for the burnt-offering, they washed in them; [h] but the sea was for the priests to wash in.

7 ¶ And he made [i] ten candlesticks of gold [k] according to their form, and set them in the temple, five on the right hand, and five on the left.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Proper instructions, well understood, enable us to go about our work, without hesitation or uncertainty, and to proceed in it with confidence and comfort. Blessed be God, the sacred Scriptures are sufficient to render "the man of God throughly furnished for every good work:" and all our mistakes and embarrassments, in matters of importance, arise from not knowing the Scriptures, or not attending to this our heavenly rule. Let us then search them daily; and beseech the Lord to enable us to understand, believe, remember, and obey his whole word; that our way may be made plain before us. Let us endeavor, that all our works may be 'begun, continued, and end-'ed in him:' let us seek his grace to adorn our souls with the beauties of holiness, and his strength to establish us in faith and steady obedience, and to prosper our labors for his glory. Beholding God in Christ, his true Temple, infinitely more glorious than that of Solomon, may we too become "a spiritual house," "an habitation of God through the Spirit," and "an holy priesthood;" that here on earth we may begin to join the worship of cherubim and seraphim before the throne; and at length in his courts above, sing "praises to him, who sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb for ever and ever."

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1. This altar is not mentioned in the book of Kings. It was four times as long and four times as broad, and above three times as high, as that made by Moses; (Notes, Ex. 27:1—8. Ezra 3:2,3. Ez. 43:13—17.) and it formed a scaffold, above eleven yards square, and five yards high.—It might be supposed that the Israelites, now that they were settled, multiplied, and enriched in Canaan, would bring far more numerous sacrifices, than they could have done in the wilderness; and the altar was formed accordingly, to be capable of containing many more. As it was so high, all the worshippers in the most distant parts of the courts of the temple, might behold, and be affected with, this representation of the Lord's wrath against sinners, and his way of shewing mercy through the sufferings of the promised Savior. This was continually shadowed forth, by the innocent animals consumed by the fire which came down from heaven, while the guilty offerers were spared. (Notes, Gen. 4:3—5. Lev. 1:4.)

9 ¶ Furthermore, he made [m] the court of the priests, and the great court, and doors for the court, and overlaid the doors of them with brass.

10 And [n] he set the sea on the right side of the east end, over against the south.

11 And Huram made [o] the pots, and the shovels, and the [t] basons. And Huram [‡] finished the work, that he was to make for king Solomon for the house of God:

17 In the plain of Jordan did the king cast them, in the [] clay-ground between Succoth and [a] Zeredathah.

18 Thus Solomon made all these vessels in great abundance: for [b] the weight of the brass could not be found out.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The furniture of the temple, compared with that of the tabernacle, plainly instructed God's ancient people, that his church would be gradually enlarged, and his worshippers immensely multiplied: and, blessed be God, in the person, sacrifice, and offices of Christ, there is an abundant sufficiency for any multitudes, however large, who can ever come to the Father through him.—May the preaching of the gospel hold him forth, as crucified for sinners, to all the nations of the earth; and may his Spirit prepare the hearts of all the inhabitants, to welcome his salvation; for all things else are now ready. Whilst we thus pray for others, may we be found humble penitents, by faith beholding Jesus, as "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world:" may we daily wash our souls, and our services, in that "fountain which he hath opened for sin and for uncleanness:" may we find continual access to the Father, through our heavenly Advocate, and receive continual supplies of his Spirit: may we walk in the light of his word, feast upon the provisions of his house, and be "constrained by his love, to live no longer to ourselves, but unto him who died for us and rose again."—Nothing can be too precious to be consecrated to his service; but he will not reject the meanest abilities, the feeblest endeavors, or the most trivial oblations, which are offered in faith and love: yet he requires the very best of our affections and of all we have; and he will much more readily bear with external meanness in our services, than with an insincere heart, however covered with specious and pompous professions and performances. The nearer we approach him in privilege and external worship, the more holy we should be; (Note, Lev. 10:3.) and the nearer we really approach to him in knowledge and communion, the more holy we shall become: till at length faith shall be changed for vision, and we shall be made perfectly and eternally like him, and fitted for the full fruition of his favor and glory. CHAP. V.

The temple is finished, and the dedicated treasures deposited in it, 1. The ark is brought into the most holy place, 2—10. While the Levites sing praises to God, a cloud fills the temple, 11—14.

THUS all the work that Solomon made for the house of the LORD was finished: and Solomon [a] brought in all the things that David his father had dedicated; and the silver, and the gold, and all the instruments, put he among the treasures of the house of God.

2 [b] Then Solomon assembled the elders of Israel, and all the heads of the tribes, [c] the chief of the fathers of the children of Israel, unto Jerusalem, to bring up the ark of the covenant of the LORD [d] out of [e] the city of David, which is Zion.

3 Wherefore all the men of Israel assembled themselves unto the king, [f] in the feast which was in the seventh month.

4 And all the elders of Israel came; and [g] the Levites took up the ark.

5 And they brought up the ark, and [h] the tabernacle of the congregation, and all the holy vessels that were in the tabernacle, these did the priests and the Levites bring up.

6 Also [i] king Solomon, and all the congregation of Israel that were assembled unto him before the ark, sacrificed sheep and oxen, which could not be told nor numbered for multitude.

7 And the priests brought in the ark of the covenant of the LORD unto his place, [k] to the oracle of the house, into the most holy place, even under the wings of the cherubims.

8 For the cherubims spread forth their wings over the place of the ark, and the cherubims covered the ark and [l] the staves thereof above.

13 It came even to pass, as the trumpeters and singers were [y] as one, to make one sound to be heard in praising and thanking the LORD, and when they lifted up their voice with [z] the trumpets and cymbals and instruments of music, and praised the LORD, saying, For [a] he is good; for his mercy endureth for ever: that [b] then the house was filled with a cloud, even the house of the LORD;

CHAP. VI.

Solomon blesses the people, and praises God, 1—11. His prayer at the dedication of the temple, 12—39. He concludes by earnestly entreating the Lord's special presence and blessing, 40—42.

THEN said Solomon, [a] The LORD hath said that he would dwell in the thick darkness.

2 But [b] I have built an house of habitation for thee, and a place for thy dwelling for ever.

3 And the king [c] turned his face, and [d] blessed the whole congregation of Israel: and [e] all the congregation of Israel stood.

4 And he said, [f] Blessed be the LORD God of Israel, [g] who hath with his hands fulfilled that which he spake with his mouth to my father David, saying,

5 [h] Since the day that I brought forth my people out of the land of Egypt, I chose no city among all the tribes of Israel to build an house in, that [i] my name might be there; [k] neither chose I any man to be a ruler over my people Israel:

6 But I have [l] chosen Jerusalem, that my name might be there; and have [m] chosen David to be over my people Israel.

7 Now [n] it was in the heart of David my father to build an house for the name of the LORD God of Israel.

8 But the LORD said to David my father, Forasmuch as it was in thine heart to build an house for my name, [o] thou didst well in that it was in thine heart:

9 Notwithstanding, thou shalt not build the house; but [p] thy son which shall come forth out of thy loins, he shall build the house for my name.

10 The LORD therefore hath [q] performed his word that he hath spoken: for [r] I am risen up in the room of David my father, and am set on the throne of Israel, [s] as the LORD promised, and have built the house for the name of the LORD God of Israel:

11 And in it have [t] I put the ark, wherein is the covenant of the LORD, that he made with the children of Israel.

12 ¶ And [u] he stood before the altar of the LORD in the presence of all the congregation of Israel, and [x] spread forth his hands;

13 (For Solomon had made a brazen [y] scaffold, of five cubits * long, and five cubits broad, and three cubits high, and had set it in the midst of [z] the court: and

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The gracious presence of God renders his ordinances far more glorious, and is more essential to their efficacy, than any conceivable external order or magnificence: and he is as really present with two or three humble worshippers in a mean and obscure corner, as with tens of thousands assembled with every possible accommodation, or every kind of solemn grandeur and magnificence. (Notes, Matt. 18:19,20. John 4: 21—24.) Yet, on some occasions, the concurrence of vast multitudes, under the direction of pious princes, has been made extensively useful to mankind, and greatly honorable to God and honored by him.—The eye of our faith must, in every service, be primarily directed to the atoning sacrifice of Christ: but in subordination to it, our sacrifices of praise and thanksgiving are peculiarly well pleasing unto God; if the harmony of our voices, or musical instruments, is really accompanied with the sweet melody of a humble and grateful heart.—All the divine perfections are glorious in themselves: but the Lord's goodness and ever enduring mercy are peculiarly endearing to the broken-hearted, humble penitent; and he especially delights in the exercise and in the glory of his mercy, in harmony with his wisdom, truth, and justice, through the merits of the Savior. This should encourage all who feel their need of abounding mercy; being conscious that their sins have greatly abounded.—The ministers of God should always be ready, both in body and soul, for every service, ordinary or extraordinary: and it has a very unfavorable appearance, even in the eyes of men in general, when they manifest an unwillingness, or even backwardness, to exceed that measure, which entitles them to their emoluments. (Note, Mal. 1:9—11.)—When the worshippers of God are of one mind, as well as in one place, they may expect his more immediate presence and blessing: if he take possession of our hearts to sanctify them, he will exclude whatever interferes with his design of filling them with his glory; and though darkness now rests upon our views of heavenly things, yet, in the temple above, "the LORD himself will be our everlasting Light," and we shall know even as we are known. (Notes, Rev. 21:22—27. 22:2—5.) May he prepare us for that land of perfect knowledge, purity, and felicity!

[Practical Observations.]

18 But [n] will God in very deed dwell with men on the earth? Behold, [o] heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain thee: [p] how much less this house which I have built!

19 [q] Have respect therefore to the prayer of thy servant, and to his supplication, O LORD my God, [r] to hearken unto the cry and the prayer, which thy servant prayeth before thee:

20 That [s] thine eyes may be open upon this house day and night, upon the place whereof thou hast said that thou wouldest [t] put thy name there; to hearken unto the prayer which thy servant prayeth [†] toward this place.

21 Hearken therefore unto the supplications of thy servant, and of thy people Israel, which they shall [‡] make toward this place: hear thou from [u] thy dwelling place, even from heaven; and when thou hearest, [x] forgive.

22 ¶ If a man [y] sin against his neighbor, [§] and an oath be laid upon him to make him swear, and [z] the oath come before thine altar in this house;

23 Then hear thou [a] from heaven, and do, and judge thy servants, by [b] requiting the wicked, by recompensing his way upon his own head; and by [c] justifying the righteous, by giving him according to his righteousness.

24 ¶ And if thy people Israel be [‖] put to the worse before the enemy, [d] because they have sinned against thee; and [e] shall return and confess thy name, and [f] pray and make supplication before thee [¶] in this house;

25 Then hear thou from the heavens, and [g] forgive the sin of thy people Israel, and bring them again unto the land [h] which thou gavest to them and to their fathers.

26 ¶ When [i] the heaven is shut up, and [k] there is no rain, because they have sinned against thee; yet [l] if they pray towards this place, and confess thy name, and [m] turn from their sin, when [n] thou dost afflict them;

27 Then hear thou from heaven, and forgive the sin of thy servants, and of thy people Israel, [o] when thou hast taught them the [p] good way wherein they should walk; and [q] send rain upon thy land, which thou hast given unto thy people for an inheritance.

V. 41, 42. These concluding words are not in the book of Kings; but are taken, with some variation, from the hundred and thirty-second Psalm, which probably was composed with reference to the removal of the ark at this time. (Notes, Ps. 132:1,7—9.)—The temple was called the resting place of the ark, because it there had a permanent settlement. The temple likewise typified the human nature of Christ, "in whom dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily;"

CHAP. VII.

God testifies his acceptance of Solomon's prayer by fire from heaven; the glory of the Lord fills the temple, and the people worship, 1—3. Solomon's numerous sacrifices at the dedication, 4—7. The congregation keep the feast of tabernacles, and the feast of the dedication, fourteen days, 8, 9. He dismisses the people joyful, and is prospered, 10, 11. God again appears to Solomon, and makes a covenant with him, 12—22.

NOW [a] when Solomon had made an end of praying, [b] the fire came down from heaven, and consumed the burnt-offering and the sacrifices; and [c] the glory of the LORD filled the house.

2 And [d] the priests could not enter into the house of the LORD, because the glory of the LORD had filled the LORD's house.

3 And when all the children of Israel saw how the fire came down, and the glory of the LORD upon the house, [e] they bowed themselves with their faces to the ground upon the pavement, and worshipped, and praised the LORD, saying, [f] For the ark typified his meritorious obedience and sufferings, by which the holy law was magnified, and through which believing sinners approach, and hold communion with a reconciled God. The ark, the sacramental pledge of JEHOVAH's strength engaged for Israel's help, would not avail without his actual presence. This might be expected, and indeed would be visible in its effects, if "his priests were clothed with salvation," or righteousness. If they were partakers of salvation in their souls, and brought forth the fruits of it in their holy lives and conversation: then, their example, instructions, and ministrations, would be greatly blessed, and made very successful. Those who, as penitent believers, have obtained mercy, and are separated from the love and spirit of the world, by the influences of the sanctifying Spirit of God, are saints. Their edification, comfort, and joy, in subserviency to the glory of God, and in connexion with the conversion of sinners, form the great object of religious ordinances: and the faith and piety of ministers, the purity and solemnity of their services, and the flourishing of true religion, cause them "to rejoice in goodness," even the goodness of the LORD; by enlarging and gratifying all their holy, pious, and benevolent affections.—These seem, therefore, the blessings peculiarly intended; though the outward protection and prosperity, of both priests and people, were also implied. —Solomon further prayed, that God would not reject his prayer, which he made for a blessing on that work to which he had called him, and for which he had caused him to be "anointed:" for that would be "to turn away his face," and to send him away ashamed and discouraged. But in this, he was a type of, and probably had reference to, the promised Messiah. He also entreated the Lord, to remember the mercies which he had promised to David, and through him to his people and posterity; and to continue and perfect them. This also may be applied to the mercies of our Lord Jesus Christ and of God the Father through him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—17.

It is a great mercy to be enabled to go through important services to the church, in simple obedience, and in dependence on the Lord; and to witness the accomplishment of them, with humble gratitude to the Giver of both the will, the ability, and the success; adoring his power, faithfulness, and goodness in every part of it, without expressing self-importance or self-complacency. For pride and ostentation, if allowed to intrude, rob God of his glory, and mar the acceptance, or the comfort, of the most useful and excellent undertakings. Here then the main guard should be placed, by those who are employed as instruments for the good of others: this, this above all the rest, should dictate their constant prayers; and all, who wish success to their attempts, should join in prayer for them, that they may be kept humble, and rendered more and more humble, in proportion as they are honored by God for usefulness.—When a good work is well finished, it is not done with: when the sermon is preached, the letter written, or the book sent to the press, or even well received by the public, its real utility depends on the Lord's subsequent effectual blessing. It ought therefore to be dedicated to him, committed to his hands, and his blessing sought upon it; and in this case we may confidently expect, that the fruit, which by his grace we have produced, will remain for the durable good of many, when we are gone to our home, "the rest reserved for the people of God." (Note, Ec. 12:2—7.)

V. 18—42.

The more we know of God and religion, spiritually and experimentally, the more humbly we shall think of ourselves and of all our performances; the more reverentially we shall adore the infinitely glorious God, and the more entirely we shall trust to his covenant of mercy and grace, made with believing sinners in Jesus Christ.—We may and ought, unworthy as we are, to expect large answers to all our prayers, which we present for ourselves and others, through the Savior's intercession. They are greatly favored who have pious friends to pray for them; and it is an inestimable mercy for us all, that "we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous," who is "the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only; but for the sins of the whole world." (Note, 1 John 2:1,2.) Yet this will not prevent the destruction of any who never pray for themselves: not that the Savior pleads in vain, but that the event shews he does not intercede for them. (Notes, John 17:6—10,20,21.)—In times of prosperity, personal or public, we should expect adversity, and pray with reference to it: and in seasons of deep distress and temptation, we ought still to hope and pray for deliverance and comfort.—Blessed be God, sinners of every description, when they bethink themselves, and humbly pour out their prayers, in dependence on the Savior's merits, may be assured of forgiveness, acceptance, and all the blessings of salvation.—JEHOVAH has made our nature his resting place for ever, in the person of Emmanuel; and through him he dwells and delights in his church of redeemed sinners. May all his ministers, of every name, be clothed with righteousness and salvation; may all his saints be made joyful in his goodness; may the numbers of both be continually increasing, till the boundaries of his church extend as wide as those of the human species! May the hearts of the writer and of every reader become his resting place; may Christ dwell in us by faith, casting out every idol, cleansing us from all filthiness, consecrating us as his temples, and shedding abroad his love in us: may the Father look he is good; for his mercy endureth for ever.

4 Then the king and all the people offered sacrifices before the LORD.

5 And king Solomon offered [g] a sacrifice of twenty and two thousand oxen, and an hundred and twenty thousand sheep: so the king and all the people [h] dedicated the house of God.

6 And [i] the priests waited on their offices: [j] the Levites also with instruments of music of the LORD, [k] which David the king had made to praise the LORD, [l] because his mercy endureth for ever, when David praised by their *ministry: and [m] the priest sounded trumpets before them, and all Israel stood.

7 Moreover Solomon [n] hallowed the middle of the court that was before the house of the LORD: for there he offered burnt-offerings, and the fat of the peace-offerings, because [o] the brazen altar which Solomon had made was not able to receive the burnt-offerings, and the meat-offerings, and the fat.

8 Also at the same time Solomon [p] kept the feast seven days, and all Israel with him, [q] a very great congregation, from [r] the entering in of Hamath unto the river of Egypt.

9 And in the eighth day they made a †solemn assembly: for they kept the dedication of the altar [s] seven days, and the feast seven days.

10 And on the [t] three and twentieth day of the seventh month he sent the people away into their tents, [u] glad and merry in heart [x] for the goodness that the LORD had shewed unto David, and to Solomon, and to Israel his people.

11 Thus [y] Solomon finished the house of the LORD, and the king's house: and [z] all that came into Solomon's heart to make in the house of the LORD, and in his own house, he prosperously effected.

12 ¶ And [a] the LORD appeared to Solomon by night, and said unto him, [b] I have heard thy prayer, and [c] have chosen this place to myself, for [d] an house of sacrifice.

13 If [e] I shut up heaven that there be no rain, or if [f] I command the locusts to devour the land, or if [g] I send pestilence among my people;

14 If [h] my people, ‡which are called by my name, shall [i] humble themselves, and pray, and seek my face, and [k] turn from their wicked ways; then [l] will I hear from heaven, and will forgive their sin, and will [m] heal their land.

15 Now [n] mine eyes shall be open, and mine ears attent unto the prayer §that is made in this place.

16 For now [o] have I chosen and sanctified this house, that [p] my name may be there for ever: and [q] mine eyes and mine heart shall be there perpetually.

CHAP. VII. V. 1—3. Fire, descending and consuming the sacrifices, was the customary token of the divine acceptance. This represented the righteous displeasure of God against man's sin, as the cause of the sufferings of our holy Surety; and perhaps, the sanctification of our souls by the power of the Holy Spirit, like purifying fire, consuming our carnal and corrupt affections. (Marg. Ref. b.—Notes, Gen. 4:3—5. Lev. 9:24. 1 Chr. 21:26. Matt. 3:11,12.)—'This is 'added to what is recorded in that book' (of Kings.) '... By fire sent down from heaven to 'consume the sacrifices ... the first sacrifice that 'we read of in Scripture, (that of Abel,) it is generally thought was declared to be acceptable 'unto God.' Bp. Patrick. The visible displays also of the divine glory still continued, or were renewed after some intermission; or perhaps were sensibly augmented. (5:13,14. Note, 1 Kings 8:10—14.) But it is probable, the people expected these tokens of the Lord's acceptance; and the awful sight did not terrify them, but only disposed them to the most reverential adoration, united with reiterated praises of his goodness and mercy that endureth for ever. No similar tokens of the divine acceptance attended the dedication of the second temple, after the captivity; nor was the ark restored to its place, but finally lost. (Notes, Ezra 3:12,13. 6:16—21.)

V. 4—10. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1 Kings 8:63—66.) Solomon's blessing the people, when risen from his knees; praising God for performing his promises to them; and praying that God would incline their hearts to obedience, that all the earth might know that JEHOVAH alone is God; is 17 And as for thee, [r] if thou wilt walk before me, as David thy father walked, and do according to all that I have commanded thee, and shalt [s] observe my statutes and my judgments;

18 Then [t] will I establish the throne of thy kingdom, according [u] as I have covenanted with David thy father, saying, There [x] shall not ‖ fail thee a man to be ruler in Israel.

19 But [y] if ye turn away, and forsake my statutes and my commandments, which I have set before you, and [z] shall go and serve other gods, and worship them;

20 Then [a] will I pluck them up by the roots out of my land which I have given them; and this house, which I have sanctified for my name, will I cast out of my sight, and will make it to be [b] a proverb and a by-word among all nations.

21 And [c] this house, which is high, shall be [d] an astonishment to every one that passeth by it; so that he shall say, [e] Why hath the LORD done thus unto this land, and unto this house?

22 And it shall be answered, [f] Because they forsook the LORD God of their fathers, which brought them forth out of the land of Egypt, and laid hold on other gods, and worshipped them, and served them: [g] therefore hath he brought all this evil upon them.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The mercies of God to sinners are communicated in a manner suited to impress all who receive them, with the most profound reverence of his majesty, justice, and holiness; thus leading them to unite humble confidence with fear of offending so holy a God. Especially, whoever beholds, with true faith, the divine Savior agonizing and dying for man's sin, will, by that view, find his godly sorrow enlarged, his hatred of sin increased, his soul made more watchful, and his life more holy: and they are speculating hypocrites, who profess to expect salvation by the cross of Christ, while the world has their hearts, and sin is allowed in their habitual conduct.—The Lord's ready answers to our prayers should animate us to repeat, with deeper reverence and more lively gratitude, our praises of his mercy.—The most endearing displays of the love of God, rightly understood, speak terror to hypocrites and presumptuous offenders; but the most tremendous discoveries of his righteous vengeance need not discourage the upright, humble believer.—Every token of his favor should enlarge our hearts in his service: and those who are inspired with zeal for his glory, and who taste the joy of his salvation, will never think too much time or expense can be bestowed in communion with him and his saints, provided other duties be not neglected.—In the best state of nations favored with revelation, there has hitherto been a succession of prosperity, ingratitude, corrections, repentance, forgiveness, renewed mercies and prosperity, and renewed ingratitude and forgetfulness of God. Yet the Lord delights in those places, where his ordinances are maintained and attended on, in some measure of purity and consistency. But in cases of apostacy, or general profaneness, or hypocrisy, he will glorify his justice by tremendous judgments upon those who have thus abused his mercies, and forfeited their privileges, making them a warning to others if not an infamy among the heathen. Let us therefore stand in awe of him; watch against all sin; and copy the examples of the most approved of his saints, in the brightest parts of their characters.

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1—3. Perhaps Hamath-zobah had revolted: but Solomon regained possession of it. (Notes, 2 Sam. 8:3—11. 1 Kings 9:1,2,11—14. 11:23—25.)

7 ¶ As for [j] all the people that were left of [k] the Hittites, and the Amorites, and the Perizzites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites, which were not of Israel,

8 But of their children who were left after them in the land, [l] whom the children of Israel consumed not, them did Solomon make [m] to pay tribute until this day.

9 But [n] of the children of Israel did Solomon make no servants for his work; but they were men of war and chief of his captains, and captains of his chariots and horsemen.

10 And these were the chief of king Solomon's officers, even [p] two hundred and fifty, that bare rule over the people.

11 ¶ And Solomon [q] brought up the daughter of Pharaoh out of the city of David, unto the house that he had built for her: for he said, My wife shall not dwell in the house of David king of Israel, because the places are * holy, whereunto the ark of the LORD hath come.

12 ¶ Then Solomon offered burnt-offerings unto the LORD, [r] on the altar of the LORD, which he had built before the porch;

13 Even after a certain rate [s] every day, offering according to the commandment of Moses, on the sabbaths, and on the new moons, and on the solemn feasts, [t] three times in the year, even in the feast of unleavened bread, and in the feast of weeks, and in the feast of tabernacles.

14 And he appointed, according to the order of David his father, [u] the courses of the priests to their service, and [x] the Levites to their charges, to praise and minister before the priests, as the duty of every day required: [y] the porters also by their courses at every gate: for † so [z] had David [a] the man of God commanded.

15 And [b] they departed not from the commandment of the king unto the priests and Levites concerning any matter, or concerning [c] the treasures.

16 Now [d] all the work of Solomon was prepared unto the day of the foundation of the house of the LORD, and until it was finished. So the house of the LORD was perfected.

17 ¶ Then went Solomon to [e] Ezion-geber, and to [f] Eloth, at the sea-side in the land of Edom.

18 And [g] Huram sent him, by the hands of his servants, ships, and servants that had knowledge of the sea; and they went with the servants of Solomon to Ophir, and took thence four hundred and fifty talents of gold, and brought them to king Solomon.

If there were no open idolatry or profaneness in her court, there might be many things inconsistent with spiritual religion; and Solomon did not think it right, that she should reside where the ark had been situated, and so near to the continual temple-worship. Perhaps he wanted resolution wholly to suppress all that he did not entirely approve.

V. 12—15. Solomon exactly adhered, both to the law of Moses, and also to all David's regulations: not only because he was his father; but because he was "a man of God," and acted by his authority in forming them. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1 Chr. 23:—26:)

(Note, 1 Kings 9:26—28. 10:22.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Some difficulty or conflict must be expected in every state on earth: but those whom the Lord loveth, will prevail; and in heaven their peace will be perfect and eternal.—We shall never be satisfied with our possessions, enjoyments, or achievements; unless we limit our desires by the precept and the providence of God: yet, he indulges his people in things indifferent, as far as this is consistent with their real good.—His 'service is 'perfect freedom;' all else is bondage: but if we, poor condemned criminals and strangers, are brought nigh, pardoned, and employed by our merciful Lord, we shall surely render him our tribute of praise and grateful obedience, though the lowest and most laborious service in his house be allotted to us.—It is hard to keep up a proper distinction between things sacred and common, in the palaces of the great, or in the courts of kings: and it sometimes requires more wisdom and resolution to govern a large family in the fear of God, without conniving at evident evil, than it does to govern a large kingdom with reputation, and in prosperity: (Note, 1 Tim. 3:4,5.) and the difficulty is increased, when by any means a man has got a hinderance, instead of a helper, in the wife of his bosom. But the truths, worship, and honor of God, should be nearer our hearts than any relative comforts: and we ought to offend or grieve any one, rather than disobey God and grieve his people, by allowing his ordinances to be profaned.—In all things, which are expressly directed in scripture, our religious diligence should be exactly regulated by it: every part of the Lord's service should be attended to, in due succession, order, and proportion; and then we should not find any vacant time lie heavy upon our hands.—In beginning and conducting every undertaking, we should keep the end in view: and from our entrance upon life we should look forward, and be preparing for the close of it; that then we may have peace, and a happy entrance into a better state. Nor ought we to allow ourselves in any pursuit or indulgence, which interferes with that grand object. Thus, "known unto the Lord are all his works from before the foundation of the world:" every thing respecting his spiritual temple was planned and determined, before he began to work; and "his counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure."—As men risk much, and undergo great hardship, in obtaining an earthly treasure; may we remember "how much better wisdom is than gold:" and, leaving the children of this world to contend for its toys; may we, as the children of God, "lay up our treasure in heaven, that where our treasure is, there our hearts may be also!"

CHAP. IX. V. 1—11. (Notes, 1 Kings 10:1—12.) 'The hard questions, she came to ask, 'were not the curious inquiries into the secrets 'of natural things, or new political matters, but 'about things pertaining to piety and the service 'of God. For our Savior saith, she came to hear ' "the wisdom of Solomon," and should therefore 'rise up in judgment against that generation, 'which would not learn of him. And in 1 Kings '10:1. it is said, the fame that she heard of Sol-'omon was "concerning the name of the Lord;" 'which moved her to this journey.' *Bp. 21 For the king's ships went to [p] Tarshish with the servants of Huram: every three years once came the ships of Tarshish bringing gold, and silver, ‖ ivory, and apes, and [q] peacocks.

22 ¶ And king Solomon [r] passed all the kings of the earth in riches and wisdom.

23 And all the kings of the earth [s] sought the presence of Solomon, to hear his wisdom, that [t] God had put in his heart.

24 And they brought [u] every man his present, vessels of silver, and vessels of gold, and raiment, harness, and spices, horses and mules, a rate year by year.

25 And Solomon had [x] four thousand stalls for horses and chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen; whom he bestowed in the chariot-cities, and with the king at Jerusalem.

26 And he [y] reigned over all the kings, from ¶ the river even unto the land of the Philistines, and to the border of Egypt.

27 And [z] the king  made silver in Jerusalem as stones; and cedar-trees made he [a] as the sycamore-trees that are in the low plains in abundance.

28 And they [b] brought unto Solomon horses out of Egypt, and out of all lands.

29 ¶ Now [c] the rest of the acts of Solomon, first and last, are they not written in the †† book of [d] Nathan the prophet, and in the prophecy of [e] Ahijah the Shilonite, and in the visions of [f] Iddo the seer against Jeroboam the son of Nebat?

30 And [g] Solomon reigned in Jerusalem over all Israel forty years.

31 And Solomon [h] slept with his fathers, and he was buried in the city of David his father: and Rehoboam his son reigned in his stead. [B. C. 975.

V. 29—31 Solomon's apostacy and idolatry are not at all hinted at in this narration: and this forms a cogent argument, that, being repented of and forgiven, they would never be remembered against him to his condemnation; though they were in one place recorded for a warning to others in all future ages. (Notes, 1 Kings 11:)

CHAP. X.

The Israelites, at Shechem, make Rehoboam king; and with Jeroboam require him to lighten their yoke, 1—5. Rehoboam, rejecting the advice of his father's counsellors, and consulting with the young men, answers very roughly, 6—15. The ten tribes revolt, kill Hadoram, and drive away Rehoboam, 16—19.

AND [a] Rehoboam went to Shechem: for to [b] Shechem were [c] all Israel come to make him king.

2 And it came to pass, when [d] Jeroboam the son of Nebat, (who was in Egypt, whither he had fled from the presence of Solomon the king,) heard it, that Jeroboam returned out of Egypt.

3 And [e] they sent and called him. So Jeroboam and all Israel came, and spake to Rehoboam, saying,

4 Thy [f] father made our yoke grievous: now therefore ease thou somewhat the [g] grievous servitude of thy father, and his heavy yoke that he put upon us, and we will serve thee.

5 And he said unto them, [h] Come again unto me after three days. And the people departed.

6 And king Rehoboam [i] took counsel with the old men that had stood before Solomon his father while he yet lived, saying, [k] What counsel give ye me to return answer to this people?

7 And they spake unto him, saying, [l] If thou be kind to this people, and please them, and [m] speak good words to them, they will be thy servants for ever.

8 But [n] he forsook the counsel which the old men gave him, and took counsel with the young men that were brought up with him, that stood before him.

9 And he said unto them, [o] What advice give ye that we may return answer to this people, which have spoken to me, saying, [p] Ease somewhat the yoke that thy father did put upon us?

10 And the young men that were brought up with him spake unto him, saying, [q] Thus shalt thou answer the people that spake unto thee, saying, Thy father made our yoke heavy, but make thou it somewhat lighter for us; thus shalt thou say unto them, [r] My little finger shall be thicker than my father's loins.

11 For whereas [s] my father * put a heavy yoke upon you, [t] I will put more to your yoke: my father chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with [u] scorpions.

12 So Jeroboam and all the people came to Rehoboam on the third day, as the king bade, saying, [x] Come again to me on the third day.

13 And the king [y] answered them roughly; and king Rehoboam [a] forsook the counsel of the old men,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In proportion as we possess true wisdom, we shall perceive its excellency, and labor to obtain an increase of it: and in the same proportion we shall become more indifferent about worldly wealth, and more liberal in our use of it to good purposes, if God has bestowed it upon us. For true wisdom and happiness are inseparably combined: but no such alliance is formed between riches and the enjoyment even of this present life. (Note, Luke 12:15—21.) It is therefore far more desirable to be connected with those who can teach us wisdom, than with those who can give us wealth: let us then acquaint ourselves with the divine Savior, that, becoming his disciples and servants, we may "find rest for our souls;" and we shall in that case see more glory, experience more pleasure, and appropriate more riches, than our hearts can previously conceive. He will and can "do for us exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think;" and the meanest of his servants will be great above all the ungodly princes of the earth: nor can they be separated from him; though, while present with the body they are absent from the Lord, as to the full and immediate enjoyment of his presence and communion with him. Next to this, let us value the acquaintance of those who love and serve him, that we may hear the wisdom that "God hath put into their hearts:" and let us follow them as far as they follow Christ, but no further, whatever may be their reputation in the church.—Seeing God buries in the depth of the sea the sins of his believing servants, we should be tender of their reputations, as well as careful to avoid their mistakes and faults.—As to worldly grandeur, what is it, that we should covet it? Neither authority, wealth, magnificence, nor reputation for wisdom, can ward off the stroke of death, or prepare us for it, or reconcile us to it. But "thanks be to God, who giveth victory" to the true believer, even over this dreadful enemy, through Jesus Christ our Lord!

vice of the young men, saying, [c] My father made your yoke heavy, but I will add thereto: my father chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions.

15 So the king hearkened not unto the people: for [d] the cause was of God, [e] that the LORD might perform his word, which he spake by the hand of [f] Ahijah the Shilonite, to Jeroboam the son of Nebat.

16 ¶ And when all Israel saw that the king would not hearken unto them, the people answered the king, saying, [g] What portion have we in David? and we have none inheritance in [h] the son of Jesse: every man to your tents, O Israel: and now, [i] David, see to thine own house. [k] So all Israel went to their tents.

17 But [l] as for the children of Israel that dwelt in the cities of Judah, Rehoboam reigned over them.

18 Then king Rehoboam sent [m] Hadoram, that was over the tribute; and the children of Israel [n] stoned him with stones, that he died. But king Rehoboam * made speed to get him up to his chariot, to flee to Jerusalem.

CHAP. XI.

Rehoboam, preparing to reduce Israel, is forbidden by the prophet Shemaiah, 1—4. He builds and fortifies several cities, 5—12. The priests and Levites, being cast off by Jeroboam, resort to Jerusalem, attended by other pious Israelites, 13—17. Rehoboam's wives and children, 18—23.

AND [a] when Rehoboam was come to Jerusalem, he gathered of the house of Judah and Benjamin [b] an hundred and fourscore thousand chosen men, which were warriors, to fight against Israel, that he might bring the kingdom again to Rehoboam.

2 But the word of the LORD came [c] to Shemaiah [d] the man of God, saying,

3 Speak unto Rehoboam the son of Solomon, king of Judah, and [e] to all Israel in Judah and Benjamin, saying,

4 Thus saith the LORD, Ye shall not go up nor fight [f] against your brethren: [g] return every man to his house; [h] for this thing is done of me. And [i] they obeyed the words of the LORD, and returned from going against Jeroboam.

5 ¶ And Rehoboam dwelt in Jerusalem, and [j] built cities for defence in Judah.

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1—19. Notes, 1 Kings 9:19. 11:1—8,34—40. 12:1—20.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The wisest of mere men in some things act imprudently, especially when, by sin, they provoke God to leave them to themselves: nay, the most equitable princes may be betrayed into partial, oppressive, or unwarrantable measures; and this is the general consequence of being drawn, by their favorites, or their passions, into lavish expenses. Thus, some cause of complaint must exist in every kingdom, of which turbulent and ambitious men will avail themselves. (Note, 2 Sam. 15:1—6. P. O. 1—12.) For, while we all need so many allowances for ourselves, we are naturally indisposed to make allowances for others. Indeed, very many would be dissatisfied, even if God were to place over them perfectly wise and righteous governors: for do they not murmur against his own most righteous dispensations? Do they not regard his holy law as a heavy yoke, a grievous servitude? and are not they ungrateful for his manifold goodness? Nay, the very kingdom of the Prince of peace, though his throne is established in mercy, does not give satisfaction. Numbers "will not have him to reign over them;" numbers of his professed subjects neglect his service because they think him an austere Lord; numbers renounce their professed subjection to him, and prefer the yoke of sin and Satan; and alas! the impatience, the negligence, the reluctancy to his service, which most if not all Christians at some times discover, evince that they want somewhat to be eased even of his yoke. Yet, his wisdom, righteousness, truth, goodness, and mercy are infinite; "his yoke is easy and his burden light;" and the whole blame of our uneasiness rests upon ourselves alone. This reflection should teach us to "abhor ourselves," and to pray continually, "Turn thou me, and so shall I be turned." And, being so culpable ourselves, we should learn to bear with the perverseness of others, and to prefer lenient to violent measures; and experienced, to inexperienced counsellors. But nothing manifests greater folly than affronting, menacing language, when united with indecision and weakness in perilous circumstances. —No man can bequeath his prosperity, any more than his wisdom, to his heirs; though our children will generally be affected by our conduct. Let us then seek those good things which will be our own for ever; and implore the blessing of God upon our posterity, in preference to wealth or worldly exaltation: let us lay our account with vicissitudes and vexations on earth, and with fickleness and ingratitude from man: and let us learn to depend on the power, faithfulness, and love of that God, who, in correcting his children, or punishing his enemies, will never fail of performing his largest promises to those who trust in him.

V. 5—12. (Marg. Ref.) The Lord did not permit Rehoboam to wage war against the newly erected kingdom of Israel; yet it was allowable and prudent for him to take all proper measures, for the defence of his remaining dominions: this he did by repairing and fortifying several cities, to obstruct the entrance, or retard the progress, of Jeroboam and his troops, in case he should attempt an invasion.—Perhaps he was become weary of his young counsellors, and disposed to hearken to more sage advisers: and his remaining subjects were very hearty and united in his interests.—Etam (6) belonged to Simeon, (1 Chr. 4:32.) and Zorah and Aijalon (10) to Dan. (Josh. 19:40—42.) So that some cities of the other tribes, beside Judah and Benjamin, remained under the government of Rehoboam.

V. 13—17. When Jeroboam had established the worship of the golden calves, in order to prevent his subjects from going to Jerusalem; (Notes, 1 Kings 12:25—33.) it is probable, that all the priests and Levites unanimously protested against his idolatry; and were therefore laid aside, to make way for a more compliant priesthood. As Jeroboam established no other idolatry than that of the calves; the language here employed teaches us, that the worship paid to them was actually rendered to devils; though he professed, and probably intended, by them to worship the God of Israel. For it was in a way which he had expressly prohibited, and which was infinitely dishonorable to him; and therefore it was acceptable to Satan alone, and his detestable associates in rebellion. (Note, Lev. 17:3—7, v. 7.)—The word rendered devils, in the texts of the New Testament, referred to, is δαιμων demon; (Marg. Ref. e.) which often in heathen writers, has a good sense; that is, it is used for the objects of their worship: but these were evil spirits; and the word has always a bad meaning in scripture, and denotes abominable idols, and evil spirits as worshipped under their names. Holy angels are never called demons.—It is not certain whether Jeroboam had deprived the priests and Levites of their dues, to maintain his new priesthood: but it seems, that, for the present, they might have retained their cities, suburbs, and possessions, if they would have remained inactive; yet, their situation would have been extremely ensnaring and perilous, and it afforded them little or no prospect of usefulness. In the days of David and Solomon, they had become generally attached to the worship of God at the sanctuary, as well as to the royal family of Judah: and, as a body, they seem to have been more pious and zealous, than at any other period: they therefore magnanimously determined, with one consent, to desert their cities and possessions, and entirely to leave the apostate Israelites, thus "shaking off the very dust of their feet for a testimony against them."—Jeroboam probably was glad to be rid of them: but they were cordially welcomed by the king and people of Judah; and doubtless were provided for among their brethren, whose emoluments must thus have been greatly reduced. It is probable, that scarcely any either of the priests or Levites remained behind on this occasion, for we read nothing of them in the subsequent history of Israel. This must be allowed to have been as noble a testimony for the cause of God, against apostates and idolaters, as any history has recorded of a whole body of professed ministers.—Along with them numbers of the pious Israelites left their estates, and came to unite with the tribes of Judah and Benjamin. They might bring away with them many of their effects: and, as the land afforded room enough for them, their numbers and treasures greatly strengthened the kingdom of Judah, and rendered it almost equal in force to that of Israel. But the chief advantage was, that nearly all the true religion of the nation was concentrated in tha division of it. Accordingly, for three years the kingdom of Judah was greatly strengthened; while the king and the people in general adhered to the worship of God, as in the days of David, and in the best times of Solomon: but afterwards matters took another turn.—It is not probable, that Solomon would have been thus joined with David, as the good pattern which Rehoboam and his subjects followed, if he had persevered and perished in his apostacy.

Jeroboam and his sons. (14) 'His sons were 'his principal counsellors, and assistants in the 'change he made in religion.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 18—21. Rehoboam imitated his father in multiplying wives, but not to the same enormous excess: and he does not appear to have married any heathen women.

Daughter of Eliab. (18) Eliab was David's eldest brother; yet more than eighty years had elapsed, since David, at the age of thirty, began to reign. Abihail must, therefore, have been grand-daughter, or great grand-daughter to Eliab, and this shews the latitude in which the words son and daughter are used in scripture, for a descendant, even after several intervening generations. (Note, Ruth 4:18—22.)

The daughter of Absalom. (20) It is said of Abijah, that "his mother's name was Michaiah the daughter of Uriel of Gibeah." (13:2.) Gibeah belonged to Benjamin, and probably Absalom, here mentioned, was a Benjamite. (Note, 1 Kings 15:1—3.)

V. 22, 23. Rehoboam acted from partial affection, and by his own authority, in advancing Abijah above his elder brethren: whereas, God himself chose Solomon to be king in preference to David's other sons. (Note, 1 Chr. 29:1.) It is probable, that Rehoboam's conduct gave umbrage to his other sons; and that he dispersed them, in the fenced cities, in honorable and affluent situations, to prevent their uniting against Abijah: but perhaps he also confided in them to retain these cities in their duty, and to defend them against the common enemy. Whatever were his motive, it was deemed good policy by his contemporaries.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is commonly more prudent to manage moderate possessions well, than to risk losing them by grasping at greater advantages: and when an egregious error has exposed us to some heavy loss, it is generally wisest to sit down by it, lest we be betrayed into still more fatal mistakes.—It is in vain to contend with the purpose of God, when he makes it known unto us: and, as his word declares that none shall enjoy durable peace in the practice of wickedness, it is madness to expect it; yet, by this rule of judgment, what a world of madness and folly do we live in!—Even those who are destitute of true faith and grace, frequently pay some regard to the word of God, and, for a time, are restrained by it from actions, to which they are inclined, and do many things which are disagreeable to them: and even this temporary faith, and external obedience, are often recompensed with temporary and external advantages.—In seasons of prevailing ungodliness and public disturbances, the ministers of religion will be exposed to peculiar trials; as they must either act contrary to their consciences or expose themselves to great loss and peril. This is the time, when God puts the sincerity of their faith and love to the proof: on these great occasions, he peculiarly calls upon them to bear testimony to his truth, and to protest at all events, against enormous evils, by whomsoever patronized. As connivance and silence in such a case are very criminal: so it is peculiarly honorable to God, and convincing to the consciences of men, when they readily renounce their secular interests, and stand up boldly for the cause of God, without regarding consequences: nor will such behavior ever lose its reward.—It may be their duty to retire from such places as will not receive their testimony, where they can do no good, where their temptations are great, and where they may be exposed to still fiercer persecutions: and in that case no possessions or connexions ought to be regarded.—When the ministers and ordinances of God are driven from any place, it is time for them, "who set their hearts to seek the LORD," to come out and be separate, that they may not be seduced to have fellowship with the worshippers and servants of Satan. Trials of this kind, serve to separate the chaff from the wheat; and indeed untried faith is not much to be depended on: but when we have been proved, and it appears, that we are willing to renounce our worldly interests, as far as called to it, for the sake of Christ and the gospel, we have got one good evidence that we are truly his disciples.—Those ministers should be welcomed and encouraged, who evidently prefer their work, with a good conscience, to their possessions; and if things were as they should be, their more affluent brethern would readily share their emoluments with them, if they saw them destitute.—It is genuine policy for any kingdom to entertain such as are willing to leave their estates and native country, purely for conscience' sake; for they will prove the strength and bulwark of the state, which gives them a comfortable asylum. But "I-chabod, the glory is departed," may be written on that kingdom which drives them away, by superstitious or idolatrous impositions, and by persecutions.—Nothing can injure us, while we keep close to the worship and service of God: but without true faith and grace, all apparent zeal and external profession will at length wither. Yet, Rehoboam forsakes God, and Shishak king of Egypt invades Judah, 1—4. Rehoboam and his princes, being warned by Shemaiah, humble themselves; and, though spoiled, are not destroyed, 5—12. Rehoboam's reign and death. Abijah succeeds him, 13—16.

AND it came to pass, [a] when Rehoboam had established the kingdom, and had strengthened himself, [b] he forsook the law of the LORD, and [c] all Israel with him.

2 And it came to pass, that, in the fifth year of king Rehoboam, [d] Shishak king of Egypt came up against Jerusalem, [e] because they had transgressed against the LORD,

3 With [f] twelve hundred chariots, and threescore thousand horsemen: and the people were [g] without number that came with him out of Egypt: the [h] Lubims, the Sukkiims, and the [i] Ethiopians.

4 And he took [k] the fenced cities which pertained to Judah, and [l] came to Jerusalem.

5 Then came [m] Shemaiah the prophet to Rehoboam, and to the princes of Judah that were gathered together to Jerusalem because of Shishak, and said unto them, Thus saith the LORD, [n] Ye have forsaken me, and therefore have I also [o] left you in the hand of Shishak.

6 Whereupon the princes of Israel and the king [p] humbled themselves: and they said, [q] The LORD is righteous.

7 And when [r] the LORD saw that they humbled themselves, the word of the LORD came to Shemaiah, saying, They have humbled themselves; therefore I will not destroy them, but I will grant them * some deliverance; [s] and my wrath shall not be poured out upon Jerusalem by the hand of Shishak.

8 Nevertheless, [t] they shall be his servants; that [u] they may know my service, and the service of the kingdoms of the countries.

9 So [v] Shishak king of Egypt came up against Jerusalem, and [x] took away the treasures of the house of the LORD, and the treasures of the king's house; he took all: he carried away also [y] the shields of gold which Solomon had made.

many deem themselves good and righteous, because they are not so faulty, in the best part of their character, as some eminently godly persons were in the greatest blemishes of their lives!—It is indeed well, when those, who begin foolishly, grow wiser by experience: but alas! that wisdom is of little value, which is engrossed by the care of secular interests, to the neglect of the immortal soul, through the indulgence of worldly lusts, and departing from the living God.

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 1. Rehoboam's religion seems to have proceeded wholly from his fears of being given up into the hands of Jeroboam: when therefore he was become so strong, that, as he supposed, he had nothing to apprehend from that quarter, he became openly rebellious and idolatrous. (Note, 1 Kings 14:22—24.) The leading men also and the bulk of the nation, so generally and openly renounced the worship of God at the temple, that it was adjudged a national apostacy:—The ten tribes had before apostatized with Jeroboam; and when Rehoboam, with Judah and Benjamin, followed their example, "all Israel," as a nation, "had forsaken the law of the LORD;" and the pious remnant formed only a few exceptions to the general rule.

V. 2. (Note, 1 Kings 14:25—28.) It is probable, that Shishak was of another family than Pharaoh, whose daughter Solomon had married; and was excited to this invasion by the reports of the immense treasures, which that prince had collected at Jerusalem, with the division in his dominions, and the weakness of Rehoboam's administration. But the Lord gave him power to execute his rapacious purposes; which he would not have done, if the people had not transgressed against him.

In the fifth year.] 'Their apostacy was in the 'fourth year ...; therefore God speedily correct-'ed them, that he might reduce them to his ser-'vice, before they were settled in their impiety.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 3, 4. (Marg. Ref.) The Lubims were the inhabitants of Lybia, adjoining to Egypt on the west: the Sukkiims are supposed to have been the people called Troglodytes, because they dwelt in caves: (τρωγλαις) and the Ethiopians, probably, were the inhabitants of Ethiopia to the south of Egypt.—It is likely that several of Rehoboam's sons were slain, or taken captive, by Shishak, when he took the cities in which they governed. (Note, 11:22,23.)

V. 5, 6. While the king and his nobles were consulting what measures to adopt, in this dangerous extremity, and perhaps were about to surrender to the conqueror; the prophet, in a few words, reminded them, that Shishak's power over them was the effect of the Lord's righteous indignation, who was contending with them for their apostacy. The time and circumstances indeed of their affliction evidently proclaimed this truth, yet they had not before attended to it: but this message had an immediate effect upon them; for they humbled themselves, and acknowledged the justice of God in their punishment. 10 Instead of which, king Rehoboam made [z] shields of brass, and committed them to the hands of [a] the chief of the guard, that kept the entrance of the king's house.

followed this humiliation; but it went no further, at least with him.

V. 7—11. (Notes, Judg. 3:1,2. 1 Kings 21:27—29. Ps. 76:10.) It is probable, that Shishak had intended to give up the city to be plundered by his army: but God suddenly disposed him to greater moderation and clemency, than could possibly have been expected from such a man in his circumstances. So that he contented himself with emptying the treasures of the temple and of the king, and carrying away the golden shields which Solomon had made for magnificence rather than for use: (Notes, 1 Kings 10: 16,17. 14:25—28.) and he did not proceed to rob the temple of its sacred vessels. Neither did he deprive the inhabitants of their private property; but perhaps he exacted a sum of money, in token of their becoming his servants. He was, however, permitted thus far to prevail, that Rehoboam and his subjects might experience the different effects of keeping close to the worship of God, as in the prosperous days of David and Solomon; and of renouncing his service, and in consequence being reduced under the power of the conqueror, and preserved from entire ruin, merely by his unexpected clemency on their unreserved submission. 'He resolved to let 'them feel the difference between him, and all 'other lords and masters: and how much more 'happy they were while they continued to wor-'ship and serve him, than when they fell under 'a foreign yoke.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 12. Things went well.] Or, "yet in Judah there were good things:" (marg.) that is, there were a number of true believers, spiritual worshippers, and servants of God, especially such as came out of Israel; for whose sake Rehoboam and the kingdom were spared: so that we read no more of Shishak, who, by one means or other, was kept from coming to extort any urther tribute or services from them. (Notes, Gen. 32:6—28. 33:4.)

V. 13. The city, &c.] It was a peculiar honor conferred on Rehoboam for his fathers' sake, and his greatest advantage, that he reigned in that city which the LORD had chosen as the place of his temple, and instituted worship; (Marg. Ref. d, e.) but it seems to be here mentioned as an aggravation of the guilt of his ungodliness.

V. 14. Rehoboam's religion was a reluctant, formal service; his heart was not engaged; he never called upon "all that was within him to praise the Lord," and he did not desire that preparation of an humble, believing, and pious disposition of heart, which is requisite in order to worship God spiritually and with delight. This was the source of his instability; and thus he was easily drawn into open ungodliness and wickedness. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.—Notes, 11:13—17, v. 16. 30:16—20, v. 19. 1 Chr. 29:10—19, v. 18. Ps. 78:9—11.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is a very common but most lamentable case, that men, who in distress or danger, or apparently near death, seem very much engaged in seeking God, often throw aside their religion when they have received a merciful deliverance. But the warning, "Sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee," deserves the most serious consideration of all, who are tempted to such base ingratitude. (Note, John 5:10—14, v. 14.) The Lord can soon arrest them by renewed afflictions; reduce them to still greater extremities; and bring trouble upon them from those quarters whence it was least expected.—Ungodly prosperity serves only to increase vain confidence, and to invite rapacity, without affording any real security; and all methods of defence prove ineffectual, when an angry God "arises to that judgment, which he hath commanded."—Every affliction has a voice, and delivers a message from the Lord; but sinners do not regard or understand: it is therefore, a singular mercy when he sends them "an interpreter," to explain the voice of his rod by that of his word. (Note, Job 33:19 26.)—Humiliation before God for sin, with unreserved acknowledgments that he is just in all that he inflicts or threatens, is essential to true repentance: but this may be counterfeited both by word and deed. Yet, when there are merely external appearances of contrition, our merciful God will often grant respites, in order to encourage true penitents by shewing his readiness to forgive. This is especially the case in his dealings with sinful nations: for a general external humiliation before God, under national judgments, is a good evidence that their iniquities are not yet full: and when there is a number of true believers among them, who are protected from oppression and persecution; the Lord will grant some deliverance, and his "wrath shall not be poured out upon them" as yet.—Amidst all our abounding iniquity, impiety, and infidelity, these kingdoms seem hitherto to have been spared on these accounts: may he reform, and not destroy us!—When the Lord is pleased to shew mercy, he can dispose the hardest hearts to compassion; the most rapacious, to moderation; and the most impious, to fear profaning sacred things: for he rules the impetuous lusts of men as he does the raging ocean, saying, "Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further, and here shall thy proud waves be stayed." But his wrath may occasion many painful effects, when not poured out unto the uttermost. These are, however, often intended in mercy, and are of salutary tendency: for it is good to be convinced by any sufferings, short of eternal misery, that by forsaking the Lord we are cruel to ourselves; and that his service, which is but another name for liberty, peace, and felicity, cannot be renounced, without our becoming the miserable slaves of the worst of tyrants and oppressors: and whenever the heart is truly humbled, the afflictions will be removed, or alleviated and counterbalanced by divine consolations.—Sin always debases those who commit it, robs them of substantial blessings, and substitutes a mere empty worthless shew of good; and whatever else be preserved or obtained, it will ruin the immortal soul, except true repentance intervene.—Unless "the heart be prepared to seek the LORD," we must perish: and if convinced, that we are unable of ourselves to effect this preparation, let us pray fervently, according to the language of Scripture, "Turn thou me, and so shall I be turned;" "Create in me a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within me." If we do this in sincerity, using the other means of grace, and watching against sin and temptation; our endeavors will not be in vain. Where these things are wanting, formality and hypocrisy form a man's highest attainments; his chief advantages prove an aggravation of his crimes; and a life of vanity and vexation will be closed by a miserable death. May we then look to our hearts, and keep them with all diligence; for the Lord especially regards them: and may he prepare our hearts unto himself, that we may serve him with perseverance and delight, while we live; possess a strong consolation and joyful hope, when we are called to walk through the valley of the shadow of death; and so have an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ! Amen.

V. 3. The kingdom of the ten tribes had been given to Jeroboam; but he and his people had by apostacy and idolatry, merited the severest punishment, which Abijah was employed, or permitted, to execute. Rehoboam had aimed to recover dominion over all Israel; but perhaps Abijah only endeavored to secure his own kingdom (Note, 1 Kings 12:21—24.)—The numbers which they brought into the field were immense: but when every man was a soldier, small kingdoms could raise very large armies upon any great emergency. Five hundred thousand had been numbered of Judah in the time of David, and it had received a great increase on the division of the kingdom; yet Israel raised an army twice as large as that of Judah, out of all their tribes (Notes, 11:13—17. 2 Sam. 24:9. 1 Chr. 21:2—6. v. 5. 27:1—15.)

after the manner of the nations of other lands? so that whosoever cometh to * consecrate himself [x] with a young bullock and seven rams, the same may be a priest of them that are [y] no gods.

10 But as for us, [z] the LORD is our God, and we have not forsaken him; and [a] the priests, which minister unto the LORD, are the sons of Aaron, and the Levites wait upon their business:

11 And [b] they burn unto the LORD, every morning and every evening, burnt-sacrifices, and [c] sweet incense: the [d] shew-bread also set they in order upon the pure table; and [e] the candlestick of gold with the lamps thereof, to burn every evening: for [f] we keep the charge of the LORD our God; but ye have forsaken him.

12 And, behold, [g] God himself is with us [h] for our Captain, and [i] his priests with sounding trumpets to cry alarm against you. O children of Israel, [k] fight ye not against the LORD God of your fathers; for [l] ye shall not prosper.

[Practical Observations.]

13 ¶ But Jeroboam caused [m] an ambushment to come about behind them: so they were before Judah, and the ambushment was behind them.

14 And when Judah [n] looked back, behold, the battle was before and behind: and they [o] cried unto the LORD, and [p] the priests sounded with the trumpets.

15 Then the men of Judah gave a shout: and [q] as the men of Judah shouted, it came to pass, that [r] God smote Jeroboam and all Israel before Abijah and Judah.

16 And the children of Israel fled before Judah: and [s] God delivered them into their hand.

17 And Abijah and his people slew them with a great slaughter: so there fell down slain of Israel [t] five hundred thousand chosen men.

V. 4—12. Jeroboam seems to have been the aggressor in this war: yet Abijah had marched into his country; and from a hill, whence Jeroboam and many of the Israelites could hear him, he spake to them as one who wished to bring the contest to an amicable conclusion. At least this seems to have been his ostensible design; though his speech was well suited, and probably intended, to encourage his own troops, and to dismay those of Jeroboam. Abijah bears a bad character in Kings; (Note, 1 Kings 15:1—4.) yet on this occasion he spoke religiously; and he seems to have had a strong confidence in God, grounded on the maintenance of his ordinances, and the number of pious worshippers, in his kingdom. The basis of his address was truth; but there was much false coloring in his manner of stating it, according to the too general custom of eloquent orators. For the covenant respecting the kingdom over Israel, made with David in behalf of his posterity, (except as it related to the Messiah,) was conditional; and neither Solomon, Rehoboam, nor Abijah, had been attentive to the restipulations. (7:17,18. Notes, 2 Sam. 7:12—16. 1 Kings 9:4—9. 11:9—13. Ps. 89:19—37. 132:11, 12.)—"A covenant of salt" is one solemnly ratified by a sacrifice and a feast, at both of which salt was used; that is to say, an unchangeable covenant: (Notes, Lev. 2:13. Num. 18:19.) but the Lord evidently did not consider himself irreversibly engaged to continue the kingdom of all Israel to David's posterity.—Jeroboam had indeed acted very wickedly in his manner of seizing and governing the kingdom of Israel: yet it had been granted to him by God himself, and Abijah never mentioned that circumstance. (Notes, 1 Kings 11:29—40.)—The persons, who revolted from Rehoboam and made Jeroboam king, had acted with great precipitation and ingratitude; but perhaps it was not candid to call them indiscriminately "vain men, the children of Belial." Rehoboam had given them no small provocation; he was surely old enough to have behaved more wisely, if he had not been actuated by a proud, domineering disposition; and it was not so much owing either to his lenity, his timidity, or his weakness, that he had not prosecuted his pretensions by war; as to the divine prohibition. (Notes, 1 Kings 12:8—24.)—But Abijah's words were more forcible, when he exposed the apostacy and idolatry of the kingdom of Israel; their impiety and sacrilege in excluding the priests of the Lord from their possessions; and the shameful manner, in which any worthless man was made a priest, who could and would bring the sacrifice appointed by way of consecration: for by these crimes, Jeroboam and his subjects were drawing down the vengeance of heaven upon themselves. (Notes, 11:13—17. 1 Kings 12:26—33. 13:33,34. 14:5—16.) But what Abijah urged, concerning the state of true religion in Judah, was not strictly just; and, as spoken by him, it savored of ostentation. Abijah himself was not a godly man; and idolatry was evidently connived at in his days. Yet it was true, that the men of Judah had the priests, ordinances, and worship of God among them; that there were numbers of pious worshippers in the land; that theirs was the more righteous cause; that the LORD was on their side, and their Captain, while the Israelites fought against him; and that the presence of the priests blowing the sacred trumpets, according to the law, was a token of his presence with them and favor to them. (Notes, Num. 10:2—10.)—The expression, "after the manner of the nations," (9) shews that the laws of Moses were not made according to the customs of the gentiles, as many suppose; but entirely distinct from them: and that the simbrought under at that time, and the children of Judah prevailed, [u] because they relied upon the LORD God of their fathers.

19 And Abijah pursued after Jeroboam, and [x] took cities from him, Beth-el with the towns thereof, and Jeshanah with the towns thereof, and [y] Ephraim with the towns thereof.

20 Neither did Jeroboam recover strength again in the days of Abijah: and [z] the LORD struck him, and [a] he died.

21 But Abijah [b] waxed mighty, and married [c] fourteen wives, and [d] begat twenty and two sons, and sixteen daughters.

22 And the rest of the acts of Abijah, and his ways, and his sayings, are written in the * story of the prophet [e] Iddo.

ilarity which in many instances has been traced, actually arose from the idolaters, in several particulars, adopting or imitating the usages of Israel.

Zemaraim. (4) Zemaraim was a city allotted to Benjamin: but mount Zemaraim, no doubt adjacent to it, was in mount Ephraim, on the borders of the two tribes. (Josh. 18:22.)

V. 13—22. Jeroboam, like a profane politician, (Note, 1 Kings 12:26—29.) disregarded all Abijah's pleas, and rested his whole dependence on the valor of his troops, and the skilfulness of his arrangements. Whilst Abijah therefore was speaking about peace, he was preparing for action: and to make, as he supposed, sure of the event, to the superiority of his numbers he added an ambushment, that he might surround and destroy the whole army of Judah, probably intending to seize upon that kingdom also. But the people cried unto the Lord in this extremity, as expecting help and deliverance from him alone; whilst the sounding of the sacred trumpets caused numbers to shout with confidence of success: and, according to their hope, it pleased God to smite the Israelites in such a manner, that they were unable to resist or to escape by flight; and thus five hundred thousand were slain in one day, which is the largest slaughter that history records to have been ever made in any one battle. This decisive blow gave Judah so great a superiority, that it can only be ascribed to a divine interposition, that the kingdom of Israel was not entirely subverted. Many cities, however, were subdued, and among the rest Beth-el fell into the hands of the victor; yet we do not read that he removed the golden calf, and probably the city was soon after conceded to Jeroboam. That prince, however, never recovered from this blow, for the Lord soon after smote him, and he died: (Note, Acts 12:20—23.) yet Abijah died nearly two years before him, and did not long enjoy the fruits of his victory, for which he made very ungrateful returns. Though destitute of piety, he seems to have possessed great vigor and capacity. During his short reign he became very powerful; he had a very numerous family; and his ways and sayings were so remarkable as to be particularly recorded by the prophet Iddo. (Marg. and *Marg. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

The promptness of mankind to war lamentably proclaims the depravity of our nature, and the influence that the great murderer of bodies and souls possesses over the minds of men, even in the determinations of senates and in the cabinets of kings. Nor can vain-glorious commanders more delight in seeking renown, power, or revenge, by the destruction of the human species, than many of their inferiors do, in listing under their banners, seconding their aims, and rushing upon danger and death, that they may attempt the slaughter of those who never injured or even saw them. Such stubborn facts stand in the page of every history, a confutation of the absurd encomiums, which self-flattering speculators have passed upon the philanthropy of the human heart, and the sufficiency of human reason, for every purpose of virtue and religion. The annals of mankind form one continued narration of blood shed in the most wanton and unnecessary manner, in pursuit of honor and dominion, or in seeking to wrest the sword of vengeance from the hands of the Supreme Judge. The millions, who have thus perished miserably, "hateful, and hating one another," exceed almost imagination: and to crown the whole, the chief actors in this bloody tragedy have engrossed almost the whole applause of their fellow mortals; or shared it with the poets, orators, and historians, who have excited them by infamous panegyrics to such destructive pursuits! Compare the whole with the short command, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself;" and then bring in an impartial verdict concerning the heart of man, and the state of human nature. (Note, Lev. 19:18.)—Yet all the blood thus shed must be one day accounted for, as murder, on whomsoever that load of guilt may fall. Surely then, war should be always considered as the last resource, a desperate remedy, never to be used when the welfare of the state can possibly be otherwise secured. A righteous cause, a willingness for peace on reasonable terms, and a well grounded confidence in God, should be considered as the grand requisites, in the management of this direful appeal to the supreme Arbiter of kings and nations.—But, it is easy to speak on these topics, without the fear of God possessing the heart. Many presume upon external privileges, who disregard his precepts: they boast of the form of godliness, without the power of it; they are justly severe upon the crimes of other men, yet they do not amend their own: but palliate the offences of their own party, while they aggravate the misconduct of their adversaries. These are not only the arts of those, who purposely frame manifestos to varnish their ambition with the shew of equity; but are often employed by such as really have justice on their side, yet forget that genuine beauty is disgraced and rendered suspected, by being painted. It is obvious, however, that ungodly princes have often prospered, because their enemies have been still more abandoned; because they had justice on their side; because many of their subjects were pious; because more external honor was paid to the truth and ordinances of God among their subjects; or because the appeal to him, and professed reliance on him, was more openly made in the decision of the contest.

V. 13—22.

The wise politicians of the world generally treat with contempt, all arguments grounded on the state of religion, and the favor of God toward his worshippers: their whole dependence is "on an arm of flesh," and if their confidence be disap-

CHAP. XIV.

Abijah dies, and Asa succeeds him, 1. He abolishes idolatry, 2—5. Enjoying peace, he fortifies his kingdom, and establishes a large army, 6—8. Being attacked by Zerah, with an immense army of Ethiopians, he calls on God, is victorious, and acquires much spoil, 9—15.

SO Abijah [a] slept with his fathers, and they buried him in the city of David: and [b] Asa his son reigned in his stead. In his days the land was quiet ten years.

2 And Asa did that which was [c] good and right in the eyes of the LORD his God:

3 For [d] he took away the altars of the strange gods, and [e] the high places, and [f] brake down the *images, and [g] cut down the groves:

4 And [h] commanded Judah to [i] seek the LORD God of their fathers, and [k] to do the law and the commandment.

5 Also he took away, out of all the cities of Judah, the high places and the [†] images: and the kingdom was quiet before him.

6 And [l] he built fenced cities in Judah: [m] for the land had rest, and he had no war in those years; because [n] the LORD had given him rest.

7 Therefore [o] he said unto Judah, Let us build these cities, and make about them walls and towers, gates and bars, [p] while the land is yet before us; because we have sought the LORD our God, [q] we have sought him, and [r] he hath given us rest on every side. So they built and prospered.

8 And Asa had an army of men that bare targets and spears: [s] out of Judah three hundred thousand; and out of Benjamin, that bare shields and drew bows, two hundred and fourscore thousand: all these were mighty men of valor.

9 ¶ And there came out against them [t] Zerah the Ethiopian with an host of a thousand thousand, and three hundred chariots; and came unto [u] Mareshah.

pointed, they ascribe it to fortune, or to the chance of war. But, the God of battles gives victory to whom he pleases: against him all courage and conduct are vain; and he will appear for those, who rely on and call upon him in the time of distress. He has often brought his people into imminent danger, in order to exercise their faith, and to put vigor into their prayers, which will be sure to terminate in shouts of victory. But, to triumph in those contests, which cause so many thousands and hundreds of thousands of the human species to expire in agony, and their immortal souls to be sent to the tribunal of God and an eternal state, can give little pleasure to a feeling heart; except as his justice, and faithful care of his people, are seen and adored in them. And least of all, can success in civil wars, which are commonly conducted with the most unrelenting rancor and most tremendous slaughter, give satisfaction to any benevolent mind. Nor are the victories acquired in those fierce, though unbloody contests, which rend the church of Christ, to the disgrace of the common cause, and the joy of the common enemy, to be more rejoiced in. But to conquer our own passions, to prevail against the tempter and the world, and to overcome evil with good, are victories to be gained by faith, patience, and prayer, in which we may safely and purely rejoice. And when the conquerors and the conquered, in bloody battles, will join in execrating their own and each other's madness; "when the earth shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain;" then shall we receive the unsullied palm, the conqueror's noblest crown. Nay, death and the grave, which so dreadfully triumph over those whom the Lord smites in his anger, and so speedily wrench the prosperous from all their grandeur, will never hurt us; indeed, we shall then gain a complete victory over that last enemy, and mortality shall at length be swallowed up of life.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. V. 1. The land, &c.] Abijah's vigor and success laid the foundation of Asa's peace and prosperity. Jeroboam, and his son Nadab, remained quiet during the short time which they reigned over Israel, after Abijah's victory. Baasha began to reign before the close of Asa's third year; but though "there was war between him and Asa all their days;" (1 Kings 15:16.) it did not for some time occasion much disturbance to the peace of Judah, through the enfeebled state of Israel.

V. 2—5. Asa not only behaved so well as to approve his conduct to man, but he aimed to act as in the sight of Him, who seeth the secret intentions of the heart; and accordingly "he had this testimony, that he pleased God." (Notes, 12:14. 1 Kings 15:14,15.) He began his reign by abolishing those idolatries, which had been connived at in the preceding reigns, especially that of the sun-images; (5. marg.) and by using his authority to retain the people in the worship of God at the temple, and to enforce obedience to his commandments. He afterwards carried his reformation still further; (Notes, 15:1—15.) yet at last, the high places, where JEHOVAH was irregularly worshipped, were not removed, though the idolatrous altars were destroyed. (15:17. 1 Kings 15:14.)

V. 6—8. The union of piety and prudence, in Asa's conduct, is worthy of notice and commendation. We may suppose that his army generally served in divisions by rotation, but could be marshalled all together upon occasion. (Note, 1 Chr. 27:1—15.) The number of his soldiers was great, especially that of Benjamin; but probably many from the other tribes were numbered among them. (Note, 17:13—19.)—Because the Lord had given him rest. (6) (Job 34:29.) Various concurring events formed the second cause of this rest, both from external wars, and internal disturbances; but the Lord, the 10 Then Asa went out against him, and they set the battle in array in the valley of [x] Zephathah at Mareshah.

11 And Asa [y] cried unto the LORD his God, and said, LORD it is [z] nothing with thee to help, whether with many, or with [a] them that have no power: help us, O LORD our God; for we [b] rest on thee, and [c] in thy name we go against this multitude. GREAT FIRST CAUSE, directed and over-ruled all, to effect his own merciful purpose to Asa and Judah. This Asa saw, and piously acknowledged. (7)

V. 9—15. It is not certain, whether the Ethiopians or Cushites of Africa, or those near Arabia, are here intended, though it is more generally thought that the latter are meant. But they who suppose the former, conjecture that Zerah had subjugated his neighbors, the Egyptians; had taken possession of the cities and territories bordering on Egypt; and intended still further to extend his conquests, when he had seized upon the kingdom of Judah.—Asa's army was formidable, though not equal to Zerah's immense preparations. He, however, placed no confidence in it, but relied only on the protection of God. His prayer is the genuine language of faith. He was conscious that his aim had been to glorify the Lord, and promote his worship, in the time of his prosperity; and this encouraged him to look upon God as his reconciled Friend and Father. Having put himself and his people under his protection, he was persuaded, that none could prevail against them, without seeming at least to prevail against God. If his army had been superior to that of the enemy, it could not have secured the victory; if it had consisted of a few enfeebled, dispirited troops, the Lord could have helped by them: for it was "nothing with him to help with many, or with them that had no power." (Notes, 20:6—12. 32:6—8, v. 8. 1 Sam. 14:6—10.) Either way he desired to confide wholly in the Almighty, and to give him the glory of the victory. The event accorded to his faith: the Lord fought by Asa's subjects as his host; (13) the Ethiopians were entirely overthrown, and dispersed; the spoil, which had been deposited in Gerar of the Philistines, and in other cities in that vicinity, was taken; and this most formidable invasion exceedingly enriched Judah. (Notes, 16:1—10.)—Asa cried, &c. (11) 'Before he began to fight, he implored the help 'of heaven; which he did, I suppose, in the face 'of all his army, that they might look up to God, 'as their Strength and Salvation.' Bp. Patrick. —Thou art our God.] 'Nothing could more in-'spire them with courage, than to believe, he 'looked upon their cause as his own, while they 'owned him for their God.' Ibid.—Camels. (15) 'The abundance of camels which they had, shew 'they were Arabians.' Ibid.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The active talents and outward success of ungodly men sometimes make way for the peace and prosperity of those, whose leading aim it is to glorify God and promote true religion; and thus they, whose hearts are "not prepared to seek the LORD," may be serviceable to others: but nothing will profit our own souls, except that religion, which induces us to "do that which is good and right in the eyes of the LORD." Indeed, this alone can prepare us for arduous and perilous services; and influence us to undertake, to pursue without weariness, and by cheerful perseverance to accomplish, designs of usefulness in our various situations: and when men in authority, or others according to the duties of their several stations, properly attempt reformation, and support the cause of true religion by scriptural means, they often find less difficulty than they expected: for they are approved even by the consciences of those men, whose sins oppose their designs.—In all our prosperity we should notice and acknowledge the hand of God: if he gives rest, none can cause trouble; and those who uprightly seek him shall find peace and comfort. Yet, while we are in this world, we must prepare for trials and conflicts; we can never be safe except we be watching and praying; and, though the grace of God will indeed be sufficient for his people, none of them will have any strength to spare. Our utmost watchfulness and diligence will not secure us from tribulation: but the consciousness of having heartily served the Lord in prosperity, will turn to us for a testimony, that we are indeed his people and he our God; and this will encourage our confidence in him in the hour of trouble and temptation. When we can clearly see that "God is for us," we shall be enabled to rest in him, and to call upon him with more vigorous faith and enlarged expectation: and then we shall perceive, that our own weakness, or the power of our assailants, is no good reason for discouragement. Improbabilities, and even apparent impossibilities, of help and deliverance, cause no difficulty to an almighty arm: and if the glory of God engage him on our side.

no created power can prevail against us. Indeed, it is our duty to employ every prudent precaution, to use all proper means, and to exert the whole strength which he has given us; and in this way he commonly helps us, both in our temporal and spiritual concerns: but he can as readily work without us, as by us; and when we go forth in his name, and are disposed to give him the glory, we shall certainly have all desirable success.—Those, whom the Lord smites, cannot recover their strength, nor they whom he intimidates, their courage; and all things work together for the good of those whom he favors. However he may deal with us in temporal things, if we are indeed the soldiers of Jesus Christ, we must be enriched by every conflict, and prove gainers by all our losses: and the approaching victory over our last enemy death, will make way for our entrance into "his presence, where is fulness of joy, and pleasures for evermore."

NOTES.

CHAP. XV. V. 1—7. (Note 8.) The prophet met Asa, and his army, as they returned from their victory and triumph over the Cushites; and thus addressed them, with words of warning and encouragement.—It is not easy to determine what times or events were intended by the prophet, in the following verses. Some think, that he referred to the state of Israel, in the days of the judges, when the people for a long time generally forsook, and almost forgot, the true God; the priests were not public teachers as they ought to have been, and the law was greatly neglected. (Notes, Deut. 33:10. Josh. 21:1,2. Hos. 4:6. Mal. 2:4—9.) At the same time the people were exposed to the invasions of various enemies, who destroyed each other, yet alternately harassed and oppressed them: because, for their sins, "God did vex them with all adversity;" and consequently there was no peace to those who journeyed, or went out upon business. Now, these times of trouble and vexation seemed to be returning again, (after the prosperity and peace enjoyed under David and Solomon,) in the divisions, apostacies, idolatries, and calamities of the preceding reigns. And the people might be assured, that the Lord would deal with them by the same measure, as he had dealt with their fathers: if they forsook his worship, and ran into idolatry and impiety, they would be left to all their former miseries; but if they returned to God and served him, he would protect and prosper them: (Note, 1 Chr. 28:9.) even as when Israel under the judges, in their trouble, sought the Lord, he was always ready to remove their afflictions. This seems the most satisfactory interpretation. But others suppose, that the prophet referred to the state of the kingdom of Israel: they had rejected the true God, expelled the teaching priesthood, and cast off the law of the Lord, and their subsequent calamities were intended as a warning for Judah; yet, even whenever Israel should repent, and seek God, he would be found of them.—Others again suppose the passage to be prophetic of the Babylonish captivity, and even of the present dispersion and future conversion of the Jews, to which the words are doubtless applicable. Perhaps the prophet had some reference to God's general method of dealing with Israel in all ages, and then no wonder that his expressions are descriptive of several distinct transactions.—It is plain, however, that warning and encouragement were intended for Asa and his subjects; and the prophet's scope was to excite them properly to improve their present success, by attempting a more effectual reformation, which would assuredly be rewarded with proportionable prosperity.

V. 8. Perhaps the prophet was called Oded, as well as his father, (1) and Azariah by way of distinction: though some think, that Oded confirmed the words of his son by a prophecy to the same effect.—The work of complete reformation appeared to Asa so difficult and perilous, through the inveterate propensity of the people and of the chief persons to idolatry; that he had not courage to attempt it, till thus assured of the divine assistance and acceptance. Accordingly, when he proceeded in his work, many abominable idols were found in every part of the land; which he removed, with those that were in the cities taken from Israel: but, as the golden calf was not removed from Beth-el, it is probable, that city had been previously ceded to the king of Israel, or retaken by him. (Note, 13:13—22.) He likewise "renewed" the altar of God, in the inner court of the temple; which, it seems, had been left to go to decay, in the preceding reigns, and had not been duly repaired in the preceding years of Asa.

V. 9. Simeon, &c.] The situation of this tribe, in part of the lot of Judah, (Note, Josh. 19:1—9.) had not prevented them from joining the general revolt. But at this time many of them, with numbers from the other tribes, submitted to Asa, and probably a great part of the tribe of Simeon permanently adhered to Judah.

V. 10, 11. 'This seems to have been a volun-'tary assembly, by common agreement, rather 'than by the king's commandment or invitation; 'unless we suppose it to have been at one of the 'great festivals.' Bp. Patrick.

Fifteenth year, &c. (10) It is said "The land was quiet ten years:" (1) hence it is concluded that Zerah's invasion was in the eleventh year of Asa. Yet that the sacrifices from the spoil should not be offered from the spoil taken, till the fifteenth of Asa, can hardly accord to that supposition.

The same time. (11) 'In the Hebrew, "in that 'day," which the Targum takes to have been in 'the feast of weeks, ... which was kept in the 'third month, called Sivan.' Bp. Patrick.—Some previous appointment, however, evidently produced a much more general concourse on this occasion, than would otherwise have taken place.

V. 12—15. The people voluntarily covenanted to seek the Lord, each for himself and all in entire union, with all earnestness: and also without respect of persons, to execute the law of God on idolaters; and on those who disregarded the sabbaths and solemn feasts, or refused their attendance on the public ordinances of religion. (Notes, Lev. 24:10—16. Num. 15:31—36. Deut. 13:1—11.) This covenant they entered into in the most cheerful and open manner; and every one ratified it by a solemn oath, with a loud voice, in the presence of all the people, accompanied by shouting, and the priests sounding with the sacred trumpets, and with cornets: for they were deeply impressed with the kindness which they had experienced, and great numbers were evidently very sincere and earnest in their religion. (Marg. Ref.) 'They reaped the happy 'fruit of this reformation, in the great peace 'which they enjoyed, without disturbance from 'any of their neighbors.' Bp. Patrick. (Note, 1 Kings 16:23.)

V. 16. Note, 1 Kings 15:10—13.

V. 17, 18. Notes, 1 Kings 15:14,15.—Out of Israel, &c. (17) Some have thought that this only relates to the cities, which had been taken from the kingdom of Israel: but it is probable that some high places at least were still connived at in Judah; perhaps as a human device, to render the people more willing to renounce idolatry. Yet, upon the whole, Asa meant well and did well, and was cordial in his endeavors for reformation.

V. 19. Baasha died in the twenty-sixth year

CHAP. XVI.

Asa makes a league with Benhadad against Baasha, who is hindered from building Ramah; and Asa with the stones of it builds Geba and Mizpah, 1—6. Hanani the prophet reproves him for trusting in the Syrians, rather than in God, and is imprisoned by Asa, who at the same time oppressed some of his subjects, 7—10. When sick, Asa seeks to physicians, and not to God, 11, 12. His death and burial, 13, 14.

IN the six and thirtieth year of the reign of Asa, [a] Baasha king of Israel came up against Judah, and built Ramah, [b] to the intent that he might let none go out or come in to Asa king of Judah.

2 Then Asa [c] brought out silver and gold, out of the treasures of the house of the LORD, and of the king's house, and sent to Benhadad king of Syria, that dwelt at * Damascus, saying,

3 There is [d] a league between me and thee, as there was between my father and thy father: behold, I have sent thee silver and gold; go, [e] break thy league with Baasha king of Israel, that he may depart from me.

4 And Benhadad [f] hearkened unto king Asa, and sent the captains of † his armies against the cities of Israel; and they smote [g] Ijon, and [h] Dan, and Abel-maim, and all the [i] store cities of Naphtali.

5 And it came to pass, when Baasha heard it [j] that he left off building of Ramah, and let his work cease.

6 Then Asa the king took all Judah, and [k] they carried away the stones of Ramah, and the timber thereof, wherewith of Asa's reign: and, as there were wars between Asa and Baasha, (16:1. 1 Kings 15:16,17,32,33.) it seems impossible to reconcile this verse, and the date of the ensuing chapter, with the other history, except by allowing a trivial error of the transcribers, and reading the twenty-fifth instead of the thirty-fifth, in this verse, and the twenty-sixth instead of the thirty-sixth, in the first verse of the following chapter. This is the date which Josephus affixes to these events, and it is very probable in itself. Other ways of solving the difficulty have been proposed, but they appear liable to insuperable objections.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Prosperity and comfort should animate us to more diligent obedience; but we need the ministry of the word to remind us of our duty, when successful, as much at least as when afflicted.—The gracious tenor of the gospel authorizes us to assure sinners of every description, that if they "seek the Lord" in a proper manner, he will be found of them; at the same time all should be warned, that if they forsake the Lord, he will cast them off; and we may know that God is with us for every saving purpose, when we are conscious of trusting in his mercy, attending on his ordinances, and walking in obedience to his commandments. But, cautious fear and cheering hope must unite to render us vigilant, active, and stedfast in the ways of God.—The history of the church in all ages, and the experience of every believer, demonstrate, that vexation and distress are the never-failing consequences of negligence and sin, even to those who are not left to final apostacy; and that humiliation before God, and diligent seeking him, uniformly make way for peace and comfort. Hence the benefit of a teaching ministry, of the holy law, and of the blessed gospel. The Lord grant that all, who are called ministers, may become "apt to teach," mighty in the scriptures, men of God, acquainted with him, his truth, and his will, and able to declare his whole counsel to the people! May he send forth such laborers into his harvest, and extend the blessing of them to the remotest nations of the earth! And may the Jews, who have been so long without the "true God and eternal life;" (Note, 1 John 5:20, 21.) without a teaching priesthood, and without him who is the true and only High Priest of the church, whom "God hath so long vexed with all adversity," at length in their trouble, seek the Lord, be found of him, and be grafted again into their own olive-tree, from which they were broken off through unbelief!—The assured expectation of assistance, acceptance, and a gracious recompense, inspires the soul with courage and strength for present duty: and we ought to exhort and encourage one another, that we may be "strong in the Lord," and that our hands may not be weak, when we are called to arduous and perilous attempts, for the honor of God, and to promote true religion.—The way to win those, who are of the contrary party, is by shewing them evidently that "the LORD our God is with us." In order to this, all abominable things must be put away, and conscientious obedience must unite with cheerful confidence in God.—Whatever the Lord gives should be employed according to his will: especially we should devote our bodies and souls unto him, according to his everlasting covenant; by accepting of his salvation, and yielding ourselves to his service. Our devotedness to God our Savior should be avowed and professed, in the most solemn and public manner. Such obligations indeed bind to no more, than was before our duty. but they have a tendency to fortify the heart against temptation, to excite us in a way of remembrance to every service, and to give us a farther opportunity of watching over each other, and exhorting one another to every good work. Unless, indeed, we sincerely mean to seek and serve God with our whole heart, and our whole soul, such transactions are hypocrisy. But, if we enter into these engagements with uprightness, really purposing to be helpful to others also, we may joyfully expect that the Lord will give rest to our souls.—Every public transaction should be conducted with cautious regard to peace, and to civil subordination in all things lawful, lest our good should be evil spoken of. We are not indeed called on to inflict death, or any secular punishment, on those who are guilty of impiety, apostacy, or idolatry; yet, they who neglect the great salvation of the gospel, will by no means escape a more dreadful doom.—No relative affections are to be indulged, when they interfere with our evident duty to God: but where the heart is upright, there will be peace and acceptance, though we come short of that perfection which is proposed to us, and to which we should continually be pressing forwards.

Baasha was building; and he built therewith [l] Geba and [m] Mizpah.

7 ¶ And at that time [n] Hanani the seer came to Asa king of Judah, and said unto him, [o] Because thou hast relied on the king of Syria, and not [p] relied on the LORD thy God, therefore is [q] the host of the king of Syria escaped out of thine hand.

8 Were not [r] the Ethiopians and the Lubims * a huge host, with very many chariots and horsemen? yet, [s] because thou didst rely on the LORD, he delivered them into thine hand.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVI. V. 1—6. (Notes, 15:19. 1 Kings 16:8—14.)—Baasha seems to have meditated war against Judah from the beginning of his reign: and probably he had made some hostile attempts before; but he was not able to make any formidable attack, till the year preceding his death. At that time, he so fortified Ramah, upon the frontiers of the land, that he not only prevented his own subjects from migrating into Judah, but stopped all travellers from passing: and this both hindered the Israelites from going over to the king of Judah, and was likely, it seems, to reduce him and his subjects to distress. In this difficulty, Asa distrusted his own troops, and neglected the proper means of defence; and he likewise gave up his confidence in God, and used very sinful means for deliverance. He tempted a heathen prince, with the consecrated treasures, to break a solemn league, and to turn his arms against his ally: and, by making a league with him to this effect, he became accessary to all the treachery, perjury, injustice, and cruelty, of Benhadad! But, though it answered a present purpose, it exposed him to severe rebukes, and he never prospered afterwards. (Note, 1 Kings 15:17—22.)

V. 7—10. Asa's misconduct entirely originated from unbelief. Had he relied on the Lord, he would have defended him against the Israelites, and enabled him likewise to prevail against the king of Syria, who was then in league with Baasha; by which he might have enriched his treasures, instead of emptying them to purchase his assistance. This was the more inexcusable in him, seeing he had before experienced the prevalence of faith and prayer, in his victory over the Ethiopians. (Notes, 14:9—15. 2 Sam. 12:8—10.) Indeed, Asa could not be ignorant, that the omnipresent and ever watchful providence of God notices all the wants, dangers, and trials of those, who uprightly trust and serve him; and is ever at hand to give speedy and effectual assistance to them, as the case may require. (Marg. Ref.) In this Asa greatly failed; and the prophet plainly told him, that he had acted foolishly, and thenceforth should have wars. His subsequent conduct seems to be without parallel in scripture. No one decidedly pious man, as I recollect, is recorded to have so deeply resented a reproof from a prophet in the name of God, as to have used severity against him for it: yet the expressions concerning Asa's character are so strong, (14:2. 15: 17.) that we must consider him as an exception; and a lamentable proof that there is no kind of sin, which a believer is not capable of committing, if left to himself: so that we must not form our judgment of men's characters from any detached actions, but the general tenor of their conduct.—In his rage he committed the prophet to prison, or rather he "put him into the stocks," for that is the meaning of the original word; perhaps excusing himself to others, and to his own conscience, by criminating the prophet as rude, intermeddling, and insolent: and perhaps, when some of the people censured his conduct, he oppressed them also, as determined to crush all opposition by violent means. It is probable, however, that he speedily released the prophet; and as he lived at least fifteen years after this event, (for so long he lived after Baasha's death;) and as we do not find that he oppressed or persecuted any person, except on this occasion; we may conclude that he repented, and adhered to the service of God to the close of his life. But, having openly dishonored the Lord, the latter part of his reign was obscure, inglorious, and troublesome.—It is not said what wars he was engaged in; but probably they were more perplexing to him, than fatal to his people.

V. 12. 'Asa had the gout, which increased to 'such a height that he died of it, as Pellicanus 'thinks; which was a just punishment for putting 'the prophet's feet in the stocks.' *Bp. so called, his sin entirely consisted in his reliance on them, instead of seeking a blessing from God on the means which they employed. But, perhaps they were such persons as attempted, by charms, or other superstitious devices, to alleviate his pain: and then the thing itself likewise was exceedingly sinful. As the Lord has been pleased to throw a cloud upon his memory, we will not further attempt to penetrate it; though from the character which he bears in scripture, it may be inferred, that he did not die without repenting of this sin also.

V. 13, 14. (Marg. Ref.) Some have considered this funeral, as an argument of the improper state of Asa's heart, even at death, supposing that he appointed it for himself, out of vain glory, and in conformity to heathen customs. Indeed, it is said, that he digged sepulchres for himself, (marg.) as Manasseh and others also did: but probably the pomp of his interment, which had nothing idolatrous or unlawful in it, was intended by the people as an expression of respect for his memory; (Marg. Ref.) for, notwithstanding the blemishes recorded in this chapter, he had been an excellent, valuable, and successful prince: and the state of Judah during his reign was most happy, compared with the distractions and miseries of Israel. (Note, 1 Kings 16:23.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Those, who on some occasions, "being strong in faith, glorify God," and bring blessings on themselves and others by so doing; at other times shew, that faith is lamentably out of exercise: (Notes, Gen. 12:1—5,11—16.) and whenever men waver, as to confidence in God, they grow negligent and heartless in waiting on him, and serving him, and in using proper means for their own defence or deliverance; and become ready to turn aside into by-paths, and employ sinful expedients. When once any person has set forward in this down-hill road, he hurries along from one crime to another, till he falls into greater ungodliness; nor can we tell into what impiety, treachery, or injustice, we may run, if left to ourselves. Well may we then be cautioned, "while we think we stand, to take heed lest we fall;" and well may we pray, "Lord, increase our faith!"—The self-sufficient are impatient of reproof or contradiction; and then the plain language of faithful ministers appears ill-nature, ill-manners, impertinence, or insolence. In this case, if power unite with haughty resentment, persecution will follow: so that they are not qualified at all times, to deliver the messages of God, even to good princes, who are not ready to bear the cross. For, in general, "the flatterer, who spreads a net for a man's feet," and merits execration, may more reasonably expect a reward from men; than he who most affectionately labors for their present and eternal good, but who will, when needful, speak offensive truth, unreservedly, and in plain language. (Notes, Matt. 14:3—11.)—Those, who venture to take the part of such as have thus given umbrage, must expect to share in the resentment which they have excited; for where rage prevails against the fear of God, justice and humanity will scarcely be attended to. If, however, any of the Lord's own people thus resent the conduct of his faithful ministers, they may lay their account with most severe chastisement: and when they repeatedly relapse into the same crime, they may expect to go down into the grave in dishonor and in uncertainty, and to leave their characters involved in obscurity.—But, notwithstanding incidental faults, we should honor the memory of those who have been useful in their generation, and that of our benefactors: leaving their eternal state to the heart-searching Judge.—In all our conflicts and sufferings, we have need especially to look to our own hearts, that they be "perfect towards God," in the exercise of faith, patience, and obedience: remembering that "his eyes run to and fro, throughout the earth, to shew himself strong in behalf of them," who thus trust and serve him; being an ever-present and all-sufficient Helper and Comforter. And he will especially plead the cause, and abundantly recompense the sufferings, of those who are here persecuted for righteousness' sake, and for being faithful to his truth, and in delivering his message to their fellow sinners

NOTES.

CHAP. XVII. V. 1, 2. (Marg. Ref. a, b.) It is probable that Asa had been engaged in war with the kingdom of Israel, after the establishment of Omri on the throne, though no events occurred so considerable as to be recorded.—In the cities of Ephraim, &c. (2) Note, 15:8.

V. 3. The first ways, &c.] Jehoshaphat copied the example of David, by proceeding to reform the state of religion immediately on his accession to the throne; and in his zeal for the pure, orderly, and spiritual worship of God: but he carefully avoided those sins, into which David afterwards fell. This is the common explication of the expression.—But as David's piety and zeal never shone brighter than at the close of his life; perhaps the words might as properly be read, "In the first ways, even those of David his father:" proposing him as his model, and not the succeeding princes, under whom idolatry had been introduced, tolerated, or but feebly opposed; and not being satisfied even with walking in the steps of his father Asa, but aiming to reduce matters to their ancient purity.—The margin reads it, of his father, and of David; for the latter days of Asa were not so worthy of imitation as his former had been.

V. 6. The heart of Jehoshaphat was lifted up, not in pride, but in courage, zeal, and vigor. By strong faith and ardent love, he was lifted up above fears and discouragements; and readily faced and endured dangers and difficulties in the cause of God. And he did not glory in his riches and honor, but in serving the Lord, and promoting his cause. (Note, 1 Sam. 2:1.)—He took away the high places in Judah; but perhaps he left them in the cities of Ephraim; or he destroyed such as were devoted to idols, but spared those in which God was worshipped. Or, he destroyed them at the beginning of his reign; but his subjects restored some of them afterwards. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 20:31—34. 1 Kings 22:41—45, v. 43.)

V. 7—9. While the priests and Levites neglected their duty, as public teachers, the people remained ignorant of the truth and law of God, and were easily seduced into superstition or idolatry: so that the reformations which took place were rather the result of authority than conviction and distinct knowledge; and thus only external and transient. Asa and his people had done well, in covenanting together to punish those who would not seek the Lord: (Note, 15:12—15.) for this was according to the tenor and intention of that introductory dispensation; under which the capital punishment of apostate Israelites was one divinely appointed method of preserving that people from sinking wholly into idolatry, till the coming of Christ. But Jehoshaphat did better, when he added the public teaching of the people from the law of God: for this not only tended to the same object, but promoted the salvation of souls, and the increase of spiritual worshippers, who would hand down religion to their posterity. The princes were joined in commission with the priests and Levites; both to excite the latter to their duty, and to induce the attention of the people. Probably they acted as magistrates, and were men of known probity, piety, and acquaintance with the law of God; who, when they administered justice, instructed and exhorted the people, and charged them, both as a matter of conscience, and as they regarded the favor of the king, to receive and observe the instructions of the priests and Levites. The persons from among the priests and Levites, who were appointed to be the itinerant instructers, were doubtless selected, because they were known to be eminent for piety and ability. They took the book of the law with them, and read and expounded it wherever they went, grounding all their instructions upon it. It must also be supposed that these teachers were intended to excite and to strengthen the hands of the priests and Levites, who resided in the neighborhood of the cities to which they went, and who were to be considered as the stated teachers in their several districts. (Note, 15:1—7.) It has before been shewn, that the prophets in the kingdom of Israel held stated assemblies for religious worship, on the sabbath-days, and on some of their solemn feasts. (Note, 2 Kings 4:23.) And it is probable, that from this time it became gradually the practice of the priests and Levites in Judah, as far as they paid regard to their duty; but this alas, was but seldom done. Synagogues, as it appears from this history, were not yet regularly formed in Judah; and the book of the law seems to have been very scarce, and but little attended to by the people in general, or made known to them by their regular instructers. (Note, 15:1—7, v. 3.)

V. 10. The army of Jehoshaphat was indeed very formidable, (13—19) yet it was "the fear of the LORD" that deterred his neighbors from attacking him: they were so dismayed, that they dared not to attempt any thing against one, who was so evidently favored of God; and it is probable, the surrounding nations had observed, that Judah always prospered, when the worship

V. 13—19. Jehoshaphat's militia far exceeded in number that of any of his predecessors, (13:3.) though he did not possess much above a third of the country, over which David and Solomon had reigned. But great numbers had flocked into his kingdom from Israel, his people increased by a peculiar blessing, and no wasting wars had occurred for many years. It is probable that these troops served by rotation; (Notes, 1 Chr. 27:1—15.) and some of them might be employed in the buildings and other business, which he had in the cities of Judah. (*Marg. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

It is a signal blessing, when the Lord raises up pious and able men, in church or state, to succeed one another. For often useful instruments are removed, or laid aside, at the very crisis when their preparations were completed, and their purposes in a fair way of being effected; and others come in their stead, who take a pride and pleasure in rendering their schemes abortive: and thus "one sinner destroyeth much good." (Notes, Ec. 2:18—23. John 4:31—38.) It therefore behoves us all to pray for a succession of useful men, who may every one of them endeavor to complete the designs of their predecessors, and make way for the usefulness of their successors: and did all pious persons, with one accord and without intermission, unite in such prayers, in behalf of the community, the church at large, and particular congregations; they would witness blessed effects, and brighter prospects would open before us.—It is happy when prudence, vigor, and piety unite in distinguished characters; when they carefully imitate the best parts of the conduct of eminent believers, and as carefully avoid their mistakes; and when the purest ages of the church are made the models of personal religion and public reformation. Indeed, we should all study to walk in those "first ways" of Christians, when "great grace was upon them all," and not be satisfied with the current standard of modern profession: this would tend to the establishment of our hearts in peace and assurance, and to the prosperity of our endeavors to glorify God and to do good.—When faith is in vigorous exercise, and when zeal, love, and active hope render the ways of God delightful; the soul rises superior to dangers and difficulties, disregards hardships and labors, and can even rejoice in sufferings for the Lord's sake. Then low, earthly affections are subdued; the heart is lifted up above them, and soars heaven-ward; glorying in nothing but the service, truth, and favor of God, and ambitious of no other honor. This exalted piety springs from genuine poverty of spirit: and a deep sense of the condescension of the infinite God, in employing and accepting us poor, guilty, polluted, worthless creatures, inspires the heart with renewed vigor in his service.

V. 7—19.

The public teaching of the word of God forms, in all ages, the grand method of promoting the power of godliness: for by it the understanding is informed, the judgment regulated, the conscience awakened and directed, and the hopes, fears, and affections suitably excited; and, as far as the divine blessing is vouchsafed, religious worship is rendered a voluntary, reasonable, and spiritual service. Kings and princes, therefore, render a most essential service to the cause of God, when they use their influence to excite and countenance those, who "labor in the word and doctrine;" and by their example and public declarations make it known, that they most approve of such as diligently attend on the instructions of such teachers. And though no violence must be done to any man's conscience, nor any one constrained to teach in contradiction to his judgment; yet surely they, who are publicly maintained as teachers of the people, may be required either to do their work, or to give place to those who will! —Notwithstanding the prejudices of mankind, and the indiscretions of individuals, an itinerant preacher, if duly qualified and sent forth, is one of the most honorable and useful characters, that can be found upon earth: and there needs no other proof that, when this work is done properly and with perseverance, it forms the grand method of spreading widely, and rendering efficacious, religious knowledge, than the experience of the

CHAP. XVIII.

Jehoshaphat joins affinity with Ahab, and agrees to go with him against Ramoth-gilead, 1—3. The false prophets assure them of success, 4, 5. At Jehoshaphat's request Micaiah is sent for, who foretels Ahab's death, and shews that his prophets were instigated by a lying spirit, 6—22. He is reviled and sent back to prison, 23—27. Ahab goes in disguise to the battle; where Jehoshaphat, in imminent danger, calls on God, and is preserved, 28—32. Ahab is slain by an arrow shot at a venture, 33, 34.

NOW Jehoshaphat had [a] riches and honor in abundance, and [b] joined affinity with Ahab.

2 And *after certain years [c] he went down to Ahab to Samaria. And [d] Ahab killed sheep and oxen for him in abundance, and for the people that he had with him, and [e] persuaded him to go up with him to [f] Ramoth-gilead.

3 And Ahab king of Israel said unto Jehoshaphat king of Judah, Wilt thou go with me to Ramoth-gilead? And he answered him, [g] I am as thou art, and my people as thy people; and we will be with thee in the war.

4 And Jehoshaphat said unto the king of Israel, [h] Inquire, I pray thee, at the word of the LORD to-day.

5 Therefore the king of Israel gathered together of [i] prophets four hundred men, and said unto them, [j] Shall we go to Ramoth-gilead to battle, or shall I forbear? And they said, [k] Go up; for God will deliver it into the king's hand.

6 But Jehoshaphat said, [l] Is there not here a prophet of the LORD †besides, that we might inquire of him?

7 And the king of Israel said unto Jehoshaphat, There is yet [m] one man by whom we may inquire of the LORD: but [n] I hate him; for he never prophesieth [o] good unto [p] me, but always evil: the same is Micaiah the son of Imla. And Jehoshaphat said, [q] Let not the king say so.

church in all ages; for great reformations and revivals of religion have generally been thus effected. It is especially sanctioned by the example of Christ and his apostles, and recommended as the divine method of spreading the gospel through the nations of the earth; itinerant preaching having almost always preceded, and made way for, the stated ministry of regular pastors. But it is a work which requires peculiar talents and dispositions, and a peculiar call in Providence; and is not rashly and hastily to be ventured upon by every novice, who has learned to speak about the gospel, and has more zeal, than knowledge, prudence, humility, or experience. An unblemished character, a disinterested spirit, an exemplary deadness to the world, unaffected humility, deep acquaintance with the human heart, and preparation for enduring the cross, not only with boldness, but with meekness, patience, and sweetness of temper, are indispensably necessary in such a service. They who engage in it should go upon broad scriptural grounds, and dwell chiefly upon those grand essentials of religion, in which pious men of different persuasions are agreed; plainly proving every thing from the word of God, running nothing into extremes, and avoiding all disputes, however urged to it, about the shibboleths of a party. In this way itinerant preaching is a blessing which all, who love the souls of men, must wish to be vouchsafed to every part of every nation upon earth. And if those who are in authority, would employ select men of known and approved piety and ability, protected and countenanced by them, to go from city to city, and from village to village, through the kingdom, teaching in every place the plain acknowledged truths and precepts of the Bible, immense good might be done. Those stated teachers, who have been grossly negligent or profligate, must either be disgraced or reformed; others might be stirred up to use greater diligence; and the instructions of stated faithful ministers would receive an additional sanction, which could not fail of producing a happy effect.—Thus it was in the days of Jehoshaphat; and thus it will be, wherever or whenever God shall please to stir up the hearts of kings, princes, and ministers, to teach the people in every part of their territories, according to the word of God. This is also the proper way of promoting public peace and prosperity; and, it will prove a better protection of nations, than an increase of powerful armies or navies: yet it may very properly be connected with the ordinary methods of defence.—Persons in authority have "much business" to which they ought to attend: and they should consider that stable peace, and increasing numbers of well maintained and orderly subjects are more honorable than the most successful wars and whatever ability any man possesses, he should willingly devote himself to God, and serve him with all that he has.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVIII. V. 1. Affinity, &c.] Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat married Athaliah the daughter of Ahab. (Notes, 1 Kings 22:2. 2 Kings 8:18,26.) Perhaps pride and ambition had some influence in forming this fatal union: but probably Jehoshaphat was allured to it, by the hopes of cementing a durable peace between Judah and Israel, whom he wished to consider as brethren. (Note, 2 Kings 8:18.) Ahab perceived Jehoshaphat to be so strong, that he had no hopes of prevailing against him, and therefore he courted his friendship. But this affinity was evil in itself, and peculiarly dangerous to Jehoshaphat; who, though firm and courageous in resisting and overcoming opposition and difficulties, was easily persuaded by fair words into improper compliances. (Notes 1 Kings 22:4,7,29. 2 Kings 3:7.)

V. 2—6. Notes, 1 Kings 22:1—7.—We will be with thee in the war. (3) Thus Jehoshaphat expressly engaged to assist Ahab, before he proposed to inquire of God. (Note, Josh. 9:14,15.)—'Ahab entertained both Jehoshaphat and his attendants, with great splendor. ... He caressed him so at this feast, and used such arguments, as prevailed with him to undertake this expedition. What he had consented to in the midst of their

9 And the king of Israel, and Jehoshaphat king of Judah, [r] sat either of them on his throne, [s] clothed in their robes, and they sat in a ‡ void place at the entering in of the gate of Samaria: and [t] all the prophets prophesied before them.

10 And Zedekiah the son of Chenaanah had made him [u] horns of iron, and said, [x] Thus saith the LORD, With these thou shalt push Syria, until § they be consumed.

11 And [y] all the prophets prophesied so, saying, Go up to Ramoth-gilead, and prosper; for the LORD shall deliver it into the hand of the king.

12 And the messenger that went to call Micaiah spake to him, saying, [z] Behold, the words of the prophets declare good to the king with one ‖ assent: let thy word, therefore, I pray thee, be like one of theirs, and speak thou good.

13 And Micaiah said, As the LORD liveth, [a] even what my God saith, that will I speak.

14 ¶ And when he was come to the king, the king said unto him, Micaiah, shall we go to Ramoth-gilead to battle, or shall I forbear? And he said, [b] Go ye up, and prosper, and they shall be delivered into your hand.

15 And the king said to him, How many times [c] shall I adjure thee, that thou say nothing but the truth to me, in the name of the LORD?

16 Then [d] he said, I did see all Israel scattered upon the mountains, [e] as sheep that have no shepherd: and the LORD said, These have no [f] master; let them return therefore every man to his house in peace.

17 And the king of Israel said to Jehoshaphat, [g] Did I not tell thee that he would not prophesy good unto me, ¶ but evil?

18 Again he said, Therefore [h] hear the word of the LORD: [i] I saw the LORD sitting upon his throne, and [j] all the host of heaven standing on his right hand, and on his left.

19 And the LORD said, [k] Who shall entice Ahab king of Israel, that he may [l] go up and fall at Ramoth-gilead? And one spake, saying after this manner, and another saying after that manner.

20 Then [m] there came out a spirit, and stood before the LORD, and said, I will entice him. And the LORD said unto him, Wherewith?

21 And he said, I will go out, and be [n] a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets. And the LORD said, [o] Thou shalt entice him, and thou shalt also prevail: go out, and do even so.

22 Now therefore, behold, [p] the LORD hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of these thy prophets, [q] and the LORD hath spoken evil against thee.

23 Then [r] Zedekiah the son of Chenaanah came near, and smote Micaiah upon the cheek, and said, [s] Which way went the Spirit of the LORD from me to speak unto thee?

24 And Micaiah said, [t] Behold, thou shalt see on that day, when thou shalt go  into an inner chamber to hide thyself.

25 Then the king of Israel said, Take ye Micaiah, [u] and carry him back to Amon the governor of the city, and to Joash the king's son;

26 And say, Thus saith the king, [x] Put [y] this fellow in the prison, and feed him with [z] bread of affliction, and with water of affliction, [a] until I return in peace.

27 And Micaiah said, [b] If thou certainly return in peace, then hath not the LORD spoken by me. And he said, [c] Hearken, all ye people.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Abundant riches and honor do indeed give large opportunities of doing good; but they are attended with such strong temptations, as very few who possess them are enabled to withstand. It is therefore a certain proof, that men are not well acquainted with the artifices of Satan, and the deceitfulness of their own hearts, and that they have much self-confidence, when they covet riches in order to do good; for they are far more likely to get harm by them. Among other evils, they often betray pious persons into improper marriages, for themselves or their children. It appears beneath them to join affinity with inferior families; but "not many mighty or noble are called:" and so they are seduced to prefer titles and estates, to faith and holiness; and the effects are generally lamentable to themselves, to posterity, and to the cause of godliness.—We should follow peace with all men: but we ought to have no intimacies with the workers of iniquity; for their caresses, flatteries, and feasts, are more dangerous than their most imbittered rage; and in fact they are frequently the result of politic enmity, and at best proceed from mercenary self-love. Indeed, the most enormous wickedness is often veiled under a shew of piety.—A very great majority of professed ministers, in many ages and places, have been teachers of lies: who, while they acted their parts with the name of God in their mouths, have secretly been prompted by Satan, "deceiving and being deceived." We should therefore be reminded not only to "inquire of the LORD," but careful likewise by whom we inquire of him; and also that we inquire his will, before we commit ourselves, by engagements that may be contrary to it.—They who flatter the humors of the rich and great will in general be most favored; and those who offend the pride, or disturb the consciences, of such as are strangers to the power of godliness, will be hated, and may lay their account with hard usage: nay, such pious persons as associate with ungodly people, must often witness and seem to approve of, very abominable things. The event, however, will shew faithful teachers in their proper light; so that even the wicked will be constrained to allow the propriety of their conduct. In the mean time, let them go on with confidence in God, simply declaring his whole message, and patiently bearing the cross; for "great will be their reward in heaven."—Satan is allowed to deceive those, who reject the testimony of God's prophets.—No policy can avert the stroke of the Lord's vengeance, when the time arrives; nor can his people ever be destitute of a refuge. He both can and will extricate them even from those difficulties and perils, into which they have sinfully brought themselves, when they earnestly and humbly call upon him: and, as he has all hearts in his hand, he can easily rescue them in their most urgent distresses.—"O LORD God of Hosts, blessed is the man that putteth his trust in thee!"

NOTES.

CHAP. XIX. V. 1. This peaceful return home exceeded Jehoshaphat's expectations, and was contrary to his deserts: and he was thus discriminated from Ahab to whom he had said, "I am as thou art." (18:3,29. Note, 1 Kings 22:4.) 'I 'suppose, as soon as the battle was over, he im

V 2. Jehu was the son of Hanani, who was cast into prison by Asa for reproving him; (Note, 16:7—10.) yet he was not afraid of bringing a similar message to Jehoshaphat. That prince's alliance with a notorious idolater was a bad example to his subjects, which exceedingly tended to counteract his endeavors for reformation: and Ahab's expedition was undertaken in defiance of the word of God, and attended with such circumstances, as rendered Jehoshaphat inexcusable in helping him. For this misconduct "wrath was upon him from before the LORD:" not the wrath of an Enemy or avenging Judge, but that of an offended Father; and the fatal effects of this affinity upon his family and kingdom, were as awful evidences of this wrath, as could be experienced by one that did not finally perish. (Notes, 21:4,18—20. 22:5,7—9. 2 Sam. 12:10. 2 Kings 11:1,2.)—Went out to meet him.] 'Be'fore he came into the city, that being admonish'ed by him, he might be the more affected with 'the mercy of God towards him in his deliverance.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 3. Marg. Ref.— Notes, 17:1—9.

V. 4. Jehoshaphat went no more to Samaria, but abode at Jerusalem, and in Judah, and attended to the affairs of his own kingdom. Being assured that the Lord had graciously accepted of his endeavors for reformation, he made a circuit through his kingdom to perfect that work, and to restore what had been overturned. For it seems, that the people had relapsed into idolatry, regarding his intimacy with Ahab as a kind of dispensation, to such as chose to avail themselves of it.

V. 5—11. In process of time, irregularities and abuses in the magistracy had interrupted the regular administration of justice: but Jehoshaphat carefully reduced this likewise to order; and took care that judges, and courts of justice, should be established in every considerable town, for the benefit of the neighborhood; but with appeal to the superior courts at Jerusalem. (Notes, Ex. 23:1—3,6—9. Deut. 16:18,19. 17:8—13. 1 Chr. 23:2—6. 26:30—32.) In all these courts the priests and Levites were joined with the principal persons of the other tribes: for the law of God was in an especial manner the statute-law of the realm; according to which both ecclesiastical causes, or the "judgment of the LORD," the pleas of the crown, or "the king's matters," and common pleas, or "controversies," were to be determined. This settlement was completed, when the king and his attendants returned to Jerusalem from the circuit of the land: and both in the cities of Judah, and at Jerusalem, the king solemnly exhorted and charged the magistrates to do the duty of their office, in the fear of the Lord; as acting by his authority, in his presence, under his protection, copying his impartial justice and equity, and looking forward to the account which they must shortly render to him. (Marg. Ref. o—t. y.) 'It 'is most agreeable to the scripture to understand 'by the things of God, those which were defined 'by the law of God, and were to be judged of by 'that law: and by "the king's matters," such as not 'being defined by the divine law, were left to the 'judgment of the king; of which kind were all de-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Nothing but perils, wrath, and painful effects, can be expected from intimacies with ungodly men: and that in proportion to the degree of their avowed hatred to the character, worship, and service of God. We ought therefore to shun all needless familiarity with them, and to shew them and all the world, our disapprobation of their principles and conduct; whatever may be their rank, abilities, or accomplishments; or however political interests or relative ties may plead for a coalition. We should indeed bear them good will, and be ready to relieve their distress, and to help them in their most important interests: but we ought to be cautious of involving ourselves with their secular undertakings, and still more of concurring with them in any of their sinful projects. (Notes. 2 Cor. 6:14—18. Eph. 5:8—14. 2 John 7—11. P. O.)—The unmerited mercies of God are often united with severe rebukes and corrections; and these again are moderated by tokens of his approbation, where our conduct has been good in his sight: for he would not have those discouraged, who "prepare their hearts to seek him;" and when there are really good things found in us, he will mercifully forgive the evil which we allow not or repent of, and accept the good, through the Savior's advocacy. In these things we should be followers of God: we must not "hate our offending brother, nor suffer sin upon him; but in any wise rebuke him;" (Note, Lev. 19:17.) but we should take more pleasure in commending what is evidently good; and bear much from those in whom "good things are found."—While ministers ought not to fear or respect the persons of men, or be intimidated by the sufferings of others in the same cause, but must deliver their whole message plainly; they should also endeavor to do it with forbearance, tenderness, and candor, which will render reproofs less offensive and more effectual. When these are prudently given and properly taken, they are not only salutary, but confer honor on both parties; (Note, Prov. 25:11,12.) and when, being united with due commendations, they excite men to renewed vigilance and diligence in their proper work, they become general benefits.—The tendency of human nature to evil renders unremitting vigor necessary in all those, who would suppress abuses and effect reformation: for, on every relaxation, evils will revive and gather strength rapidly, and all will need to be done over again.—The ministry and the magistracy, when restricted to their distinct methods, may concur in promoting godliness, as well as preserving public peace: and all legal decisions should be expedited in a regular and easy method, and with little expense; that the poor may be placed, as nearly as possible, at an equal advantage with the rich, in obtaining their dues.—Magistrates are the vicegerents, of the Governor and Judge of the world, and are therefore to be obeyed in all things lawful for the Lord's sake. (Notes, Rom. 13:1—7.) But there lies an appeal from their decisions to a superior tribunal; and they should be constantly and solemnly reminded, that they will be exposed to condemnation, if they do not act uprightly in the fear of God, without respect of persons, or taking of gifts. And, besides executing the laws of man impartially, it is their duty also to warn men not to trespass against the Lord, lest wrath come upon them and their brethren. (Note, 17:7—9.) They should therefore take heed and deal courageously, not fearing the displeasure of man, but confiding in the protection of God, who is with them in the judgment; that he may indeed be with them for their good. May he provide increasing numbers of good ministers and good magistrates, to suppress vice, and to promote the cause of truth and holiness!

CHAP. XX. V. 1, 2. (Notes, 14:1—15. 31:20, 21. 32:1—8. 1 Sam. 7:1—7.) "The fear of the Lord had fallen upon the kingdoms round about Judah;" and Jehoshaphat had so long enjoyed peace, that he seems to have neglected his military arrangements, and to have relaxed his vigilance. (Notes, 17:10—19.) Perhaps his enemies observed this, and thought to take advantage of it; or they had heard "that wrath was upon him from before the LORD," for uniting with Ahab. This formidable armament consisted of Moabites, Ammonites, and the allies of the Ammonites; (Note, 10,11.) and came from "beyond the sea on this side Syria," that is the dead sea, or salt sea, which was considered as one of the western boundaries of Syria; and they were encamped in his dominions, at Engedi, (*Marg. their intentions. This would prevent his mustering all his forces.

V. 3, 4. Probably, this invasion took place not long after Jehoshaphat's return from Ramoth-gilead; and he was afraid, that God was about to chastise his sin by permitting the devastation of his kingdom. To avert this calamity, "he set himself to seek the LORD." It may be supposed, that he made the best military arrangement of which the exigency would admit: but his chief preparation consisted in proclaiming a fast, and gathering his people together to ask help of the Lord.—We have in the preceding books of scripture, read of private fasting with prayer; of "afflicting the soul" at the day of atonement; of the people's fasting at the instance of Samuel the prophet; and of their fasting by common consent: (Notes, Lev. 16:29—31. Deut. 9:18,25. Judg. 20:26—28. 1 Sam. 7:5,6. 2 Sam. 12:16.) but the fast here mentioned was observed at the proclamation of the chief magistrate, who acted by the authority of his station, and not by the Spirit of prophecy: and the event of this measure, both warrants civil governors in times of distress to act in this manner, and encourages them to expect the most important benefits from it. Every one was called on to humble himself before God for his own sins, and the sins of the public, as the aggregate of the whole. Thus they united in expressing their sorrow and self-displacency for their sins; and they publicly honored God as the righteous Author of their calamity, and as their only Hope and Refuge in distress. All other cares being laid aside, they were at leisure to unite in uninterrupted and fervent prayers for help and forgiveness. Doubtless serious impressions would be made on many, who before had been inattentive; the pious affections of others would be revived, and rendered more fixed and lively; and in every way it would tend to the honor of God, and the good of his people.

V. 5. New court.] It is not known what is here meant by the new court: but, probably, Jehoshaphat had rebuilt some of the courts, or had added one to them.

V. 6—9. After the example of Solomon, Jehoshaphat himself offered the public prayer for this large congregation, in words which proceeded from the abundance of his heart: a careful examination of the marginal references will be found the best comment on them. (Notes, 1 Kings 8:33—43. 1 Chr. 29:10—19.)—Abraham thy friend. (7) אֹהֲבְךָ: a lover of thee. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, John 15:12—16. Jam. 2:22—29.)

V. 10, 11. The mention of mount Seir, the country of Edom, shews what is meant in the first verse by "other beside the Ammonites."—The Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, had been expressly named as nations whom Israel must not invade: and the divine admonition had been exactly attended to. (Deut. 2:4—7,9, 19. Note, Num. 20:14—21.) Other wars indeed had brought some of them under the dominion of Judah and Israel: but it seems the superiority had been used with gentleness, and no reason had been given for this violent assault; in which, it is probable, the confederates meant to destroy the kingdom of Judah, and the house of David; as well as to expel the people of God, from that land which was "his possession:" so that the war was indeed waged against the LORD himself (Notes, Judg. 11:12—27.)

V. 12. The language of this verse is peculiarly expressive of humble, genuine faith. The appeal, as to the justice of the cause, is simply, yet emphatically, made to God; and the inability of Jehoshaphat, with the force which he had hastily collected, or indeed with any forces apart from the powerful aid of God, to resist so vast an army; the perplexity to which he was reduced; and his only refuge from despair, by firmly relying on the Almighty, and expecting help from him, as pleading his own cause in pleading theirs; are stated in the most natural and affecting manner. (Note, 14:9—15.)—'In this weak and de-'clining condition, wherein the church now is, ... 'let us say daily with Jehoshaphat, "We know 'not what to do; but our eyes are unto thee." Do 'not remember our iniquities, but save us for thy 'mercy's sake; for we are brought very low.'—'Such addresses to God .. will illustrate this 'prayer of Jehoshaphat, better than the largest 'commentaries.' Victorinus Strigelius in Bp. Patrick.

V. 13. With their little ones.] Notes, Deut. 29:10—15. 31:10—13. Ezra 10:1. Neh. 8:1,2. Joel 2:15—17.—Not only the women, and the children who were grown up, attended on this occasion, but the infants also: for it is probable the people intended their presence, as a silent plea with the Lord to have mercy upon them, for the sake of their helpless offspring. (Note, Jon. 4:9—11.)

V. 14—17. The Lord did not speak, on this occasion, by the high priest, but by an ordinary Levite descended from Asaph, who, it is probable, was an eminently pious person. Whether he had previously been known as a prophet, or not, all present were satisfied that he spoke by the Spirit of God. He assured them of the Lord's especial interposition; for, as the battle immediately concerned his honor, it would be decided by his power. "The war is not to you, but to God." (Note, 10,11.) Without any fear of the immense multitude of their invaders, they were ordered to march forth the next day, not to fight, but to witness the salvation of the Lord with them, and his answer to their fervent prayers. (Notes, Ex. 14:13,14. 1 Sam. 17:45—47.)

V. 18, 19. The king and his people, placing the most entire confidence in the divine promise, at once anticipated its fulfilment, and directly joined in an act of solemn adoration, and in songs of gratitude and praise for this yet unaccomplished deliverance.

V. 20, 21. Jehoshaphat seems not greatly to have regarded the arrangement of his army; for he so firmly believed the words of the prophet, that he marched forth as to a triumph, and not to a battle. Accordingly he exhorted his troops to a firm faith in God, and an entire reliance on his power, faithfulness, and covenanted mercy to his people; and a confident expectation, that all his words spoken to them by his prophets should be accomplished: for thus, and thus only, could they be established, and prosper. (Is. 7:9.) Having consulted with the chief persons of the people that were with him, he also appointed singers to go before the army, "that should praise the beauty of holiness:" that is, according to some expositors, exactly as they used to do at his beautiful and to praise, [d] the LORD set ambushments against the children of Ammon, Moab, and mount Seir, which were come against Judah; and they * were smitten.

23 For the children of Ammon and Moab stood up against the inhabitants of [e] mount Seir, utterly to slay and destroy them: and when they had made an end of the inhabitants of Seir, every one helped [f] to destroy another.

24 And when Judah came toward the watch-tower in the wilderness, they looked unto the multitude, and, behold, [f] they were dead bodies fallen to the earth, and [g] none escaped.

25 And when Jehoshaphat and his people came to take away the spoil of them, [g] they found among them in abundance both riches with the dead bodies, and [h] precious jewels, which they stripped off for themselves, more than they could carry away: and they were three days in gathering of the spoil, it was so much.

26 And on the fourth day they assembled themselves in the valley of § Berachah; for there they [i] blessed the LORD: therefore [j] the name of the same place was called, The valley of Berachah, [k] unto this day.

27 Then they returned, every man of Judah and Jerusalem, and Jehoshaphat in the ‖ forefront of them, to go again to Jerusalem with joy; for [l] the LORD had made them to rejoice over their enemies.

28 And they came to Jerusalem [m] with psalteries, and harps, and trumpets, unto the house of the LORD.

29 And [n] the fear of God was on all the kingdoms of those countries, when [o] they had heard that the LORD fought against the enemies of Israel.

30 So the realm of Jehoshaphat was quiet: for [p] his God gave him rest round about.

31 ¶ And [q] Jehoshaphat reigned over Judah: he was thirty and five years old when he began to reign, and he reigned twenty and five years in Jerusalem. And his mother's name was Azubah, the daughter of Shilhi.

32 And [r] he walked in [s] the way of Asa his father, and [t] departed not from it, doing that which was right in the sight of the LORD.

33 Howbeit, [u] the high places were not taken away: for as yet the people [x] had not prepared their hearts unto the God of their fathers.

34 Now [y] the rest of the acts of Jehoshaphat, first and last, behold, they are written in the ¶ book of [z] Jehu the son of Hanani, who  is mentioned in the book of the kings of Israel.

anctuary. But perhaps the expression rather means, that they should celebrate the glorious excellences of God, which render him "the Perfection of beauty," and the meet object of the most absolute love, confidence, and delight of all his rational creatures; especially, as "his mercy which endureth for ever," is displayed in perfect harmony with his more awful attributes. (Notes, 5:12,13. 7:1—3. 1 Chr. 16:28,29. Ps. 50:1,2. 90:13—17. 136:1—3.)

V. 22—25. Some commentators, both ancient and modern, think that angels were employed on this occasion, who came on the invaders by surprise, as from an ambushment, and slew some of them: and that the survivors supposed themselves assaulted by their confederates; and so retaliated, till they fell into utter confusion, and entirely destroyed one another.—But perhaps the Lord only left the several nations to a natural distrust and jealousy of each other: and thus some of them formed ambushments against the rest, which terminated in their mutual destruction. Or perhaps the ambushments placed against the Jews, fell by mistake on their own allies. This, however, fulfilled the purpose of God, as effectually as if he had placed the ambushments, or they had acted in obedience to his commandment. The slaughter was universal, and the spoil immense; so that this invasion served exceedingly to enrich Jehoshaphat and his kingdom. (Notes, 32:27—29. Rom. 8:35—39.)

V. 26—28. "Berachah" signifies Blessing. Having previously sought deliverance, by fasting and prayer, and received the assurance of it with grateful joy, Jehoshaphat and his army returned immediate and most fervent thanks and praise to the Lord, who had in so wonderful a manner performed his promise. 'They did not return every 'man to his own home; ... but first went back to 'Jerusalem to bless him' (the Lord) 'again for 'hearing their prayers, and making good his promises.' Bp. Patrick. The whole forms a most remarkable and instructive history: and no undertaking, recorded in Scripture, was entered on, conducted, and concluded, in a more unexceptionable manner.

V. 29, 30. When the surrounding nations perceived how wonderfully the Lord had destroyed this powerful armament, they dared not to attack Jehoshaphat any more; and thus God gave him rest round about, which continued during the remainder of his reign. (Note, 17:10.)

not suitably prepared for the regular and cordial worship of God at Jerusalem: so that Jehoshaphat either did not dare to attempt, or was not able to effect, an entire and abiding suppression of all those high places, where God was irregularly worshipped. (Marg. Ref. u, x. Notes, 17:6. 19:2—4.)

V. 35—37. Jehoshaphat's affinity with Ahab's family drew him in to join in this traffic with wicked Ahaziah, for which he was rebuked and chastened; and afterwards he refused to join with him. Ahaziah died within less than two years after Ahab, and Jehoshaphat survived him for a considerable time. (Notes, 1 Kings 22:48,49. 2 Kings 1:1—17. 8:16,17.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

Uninterrupted peace must not be expected in this world, even when we are most devotedly serving God. The enemies of true religion are the more exasperated by our zeal to promote it; our own miscarriages require rebukes; trials are needful to repress pride; and difficulties form the proper exercise and discovery of our faith, love, patience, and hope in God. Thus his honor, the edification of others, the good of our own souls, and our situation in the midst of ungodly men, all require that "in the world we should have tribulation."—In calamities or dangers, public or personal, our first business should be to seek help from the Lord. When two or three agree in doing this, that concurrence adds energy to their supplications: how much more then, when multitudes with one accord pour out their fervent supplications for the same common blessing! Hence the advantage of days appointed for national fasting and prayer. Such seasons remind the remnant of believers to unite in the same requests, as with one heart and one voice: and even the cries of unconverted men for outward mercies form an honorable acknowledgment of God, and of man's entire dependence on him; and frequently receive a gracious answer. It is therefore commendable in Christian princes to call their people to these solemn services; and it is indeed a most important part of their duty and true wisdom: but it can scarcely be supposed that the mere appointment is sufficient; unless their own example proves that they are in earnest in the sacred service, let who will be formal. It is also the duty of every individual, according to his station in the community, to concur in such pious measures, and to stir up himself and those around him, to engage cordially in them, that good impressions may be made, fixed, or revived in the minds of men in every place.—What then shall we think of those, who call themselves Christians and patriots; yet not only neglect, but ridicule or revile, this scriptural method of seeking help in danger, from our almighty Friend, after an example so honored by God himself? or of those, who give occasion to such reproach and contempt, by their absurd and manifest hypocrisy in these observances?—The fear of wrath, when united with a hope of mercy, excites sinners to seek the Lord in good earnest; and is often useful to quicken the believer, when his love has subsided, and he is grown slothful in the concerns of his soul. We must, therefore, first approach the holy majesty of our God, with humiliation for our sin, justifying him in all we suffer or fear, and confiding only in his mercy for acceptance, and in his power for protection. And in all ages of the church, fasting has been deemed an expedient attendant upon such exercises, on particular occasions, personal and public; being expressive of a mind abstracted from earthly things; conscious of having forfeited every enjoyment by sin; and attentive only to obtain the great objects which the soul is then pursuing.—All believers are sons of Abraham and "friends of God:" with such persons the everlasting covenant is established, and to them every promise belongs. (Notes, Gen. 12:1—3. John 15:12—16. Rom. 5:1,2.) Even in those distresses, which are intended for the correction of their sins, when they cry unto the Lord, he will hear and help them. Their enemies are his enemies; and when they are rewarded with evil for good, he will appear for them and plead their cause. When they are the most indisposed to avenge themselves, and least able to ward off injuries, their dependence on God will become more unreserved, and their prayers more fervent: and he will no more forsake those, who "know not what to do," but look up to him alone for help; than a fond mother will desert her helpless infant, that clings to her bosom, and knows and seeks no other refuge. Indeed, this is the very frame of mind, to which he designs to form his people.—The covenant is made with believers "for the good of their children after them;" and they should bring them, and the rest of their families, as soon as possible, to the ordinances of God, that they may be trained up in his house, and become truly a part of his family.

V. 14—37.

The Lord will surely speak peace to those, who seek him in a due manner: and when his word banishes our fears and calms our spirits, our prayers are answered in good measure, even previously to those providential deliverances, of which we have received a blessed pledge.—If our sins be pardoned, "God is for us;" and "if he be for us, who can be against us?" We need not be dismayed at the number and power of our enemies, or on account of our own weakness: "the battle is the LORD's," and the victory is sure. We have only to observe his word of command, whether he call us to labor, to wrestle, and strive; or whether it become our part to "stand still, and to see the salvation of the LORD." When vigorous faith receives the promises, their accomplishment is anticipated with humble gratitude. The Christian soldier may sing his songs of triumph, when marching to the field, or conflicting in his spiritual battles, being assured that he shall be "made more than conqueror, through the Savior who hath loved him:" and thus, the joy and praise of the church militant may emulate and anticipate that of the church triumphant.—But alas! our faith is apt to waver, and then our joys decline: believers need frequent exhortations to persevering faith and hope in God; and it becomes the strong in this manner to animate the weak.—As we cannot know the truth and promises of God, except by his prophets and apostles; how can we believe in him, unless we firmly credit their infallible testimony, as recorded in the sacred Scriptures? In proportion as we expect protection in this way from God, by obedient faith, we "shall be established," and prosper; and shall adore the beauty of the divine holiness, and the everlasting mercy of God in Christ Jesus, with thankful hearts: and the more generally and publicly this is done in any country, the greater stability and success will attend the affairs of the nation. When we thus arrange and conduct our affairs, our enemies will fall before us; our trials will prove our gain; and our very sorrows will enrich our souls with more abundant rejoicing. The advantage will be all our own; but the whole glory will be ascribed to the Lord.—We should always render our tribute of praise and gratitude for mercies received, when our hearts are impressed with a lively sense of the loving-kindness of God: as thanksgivings, for public or private benefits, grow languid by delay. But alas! we find very few who are so prompt to return thanks for favors vouchsafed, as they were to cry for relief in the hour of distress. (Note and P. O. Luke 17:11—19.) Blessed be God, there are some honorable exceptions, whose example proves very useful.—Mercy thus sought and improved will be durable; and if God give us rest, none will dare to molest us.—But the best of men seldom shine so bright in prosperity, as in adversity: and even relapses into sin may be noticed in very valuable characters, which the Lord will mark with rebukes and chastenings. Many things must also remain imperfect in the church on earth; for there are many desirable regulations which the greatest reformers have not ventured to attempt, or have not been able to accomplish: and indeed, except men's "hearts are prepared to seek the LORD," magistrates and ministers can do nothing effectual. The zealous, however, will never labor in vain. Much good will be done, though not all which they desire. God will graciously accept their endeavors; and in heaven they will be associated with "the spirits of just men made perfect," and made like them in holiness and felicity.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXI. V. 2. The second Azariah, in the original, is called Azariahu.—King of Israel.] Jehoshaphat is called here "the king of Israel," not "king of Judah;" as the whole nation sprang from Jacob, whom God surnamed Israel; and he reigned over a considerable part of it. (4. 28: 19.)

V. 3. Perhaps Jehoram had acted the hypocrite during his father's life-time: but, even if he shewed his evil disposition, Jehoshaphat, having no command from God, did not think it proper to set him aside; otherwise his brethren were better than he, more wise and more righteous. (Note, 13.) The succession of so wicked a king as Jehoram, to pious Jehoshaphat, was a just judgment on the men of Judah for "not having prepared their hearts unto the God of their fathers," during the preceding reigns. (Note, 20:31—34, v. 33.)

V. 4. On one pretence or another, Jehoram cruelly slew all his brethren, from a jealous ambition, lest they should supplant him in his authority; which was probably increased by their reputation and favor with the people; and the affluence and authority to which Jehoshaphat had raised them. (Note, Judg. 9:4—6.) He slew some of the princes also, who probably favored them. Some think these were the magistrates whom Jehoshaphat had appointed. (19:5—11.) This he did, lest they should revenge on him the murder of his brethren.

The same time also did [o] Libnah revolt from under his hand; [p] because he had forsaken the LORD God of his fathers.

11 Moreover [q] he made high places in the mountains of Judah, and [r] caused the inhabitants of Jerusalem to commit [s] fornication, and [t] compelled Judah thereto.

12 ¶ And there came [u] a writing to him from [x] Elijah the prophet, saying, Thus saith the LORD God of David thy father; Because thou hast not walked [y] in the ways of Jehoshaphat thy father, nor [z] in the ways of Asa king of Judah;

13 But hast walked [a] in the way of the kings of Israel, and hast made Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem to go a [b] whoring, like to the whoredoms of the house of Ahab, and also [c] hast slain thy brethren of thy father's house, which were better than thyself:

14 Behold, with a great * plague will the LORD smite [d] thy people, and [e] thy children, and thy wives, and all thy goods.

15 And thou shalt have great sickness [f] by disease of thy bowels, until [g] thy bowels fall out, by reason of [h] the sickness day by day.

16 ¶ Moreover [i] the LORD stirred up against Jehoram the spirit [B. C. 884.] of the [k] Philistines, and of the Arabians, that were near the Ethiopians:

17 And they came up into Judah, and brake into it, and [†] carried away all the substance that was found in the king's house, and [l] his sons also, and his wives; so that there was never a son left him, save [m] Jehoahaz, the youngest of his sons.

18 And after all this the LORD smote him in his bowels with [n] an incurable disease.

19 And it came to pass, that in process of time, after the end of two years, his bowels fell out by reason of his sickness: so he died of sore diseases. And his people [o] made no burning for him, like the burning of his fathers.

V. 8—11. (Note, 2 Kings 8:20—24.) Jehoram obtained some advantages over the Edomites, but could not re-establish his dominion.—Libnah seems to have revolted, because they would not submit to his idolatrous impositions.—The inhabitants of Jerusalem were induced by his persuasions to fall in with his idolatry; but the other parts of Judah were compelled to it by persecution.—All kinds of licentious and unnatural practices, to the extreme disgrace of human nature, were encouraged, and even held sacred, in the worship of these abominable idols, as may undeniably be proved even from pagan authors.

V. 12. If the account of Elijah's translation be given according to the order of time in which it occurred, it happened before Jehoram reigned alone. (Notes, 2 Kings 2:11—18. 3:11,12.) But the spirit of prophecy might direct Elijah, to prepare this writing before his translation, in the foresight of Jehoram's crimes; it might be left to Elisha, or some other prophet, to transmit it to him; and coming in that extraordinary manner, it would have a peculiarly awful energy. 'Elijah, foreseeing by the Spirit of prophecy, be-'fore he went to heaven, the wickedness of Je-'horam, spake these words to one of the prophets, 'and charged him to put them down in writing, 'and to send them in a letter to Jehoram, when 'he grew so impious as is here related; and let 'him know, that Elijah commanded this writing 'to be delivered to him: that so Jehoram being 'affected with it, as if it had been sent from 'heaven, might be moved to repent of the evil 'he had done.' Bp. Patrick.—Some, however, have not improbably conjectured, that Elisha, and not Elijah, is intended.—The opinion, found in Josephus, and elsewhere, that this letter was sent by Elijah from heaven, only shews, that the papists have not the honor of being the first inventors of such legendary tales. (Acts 19:35.)

V. 13. Better.] Jehoram's brethren seem to have been pious persons, and hated for the same cause as Abel was hated by Cain. 'This seems 'to signify that they were pious persons, who 'abhorred idolatry: and therefore his sin was 'the more heinous, in cutting them off, proceed-'ing from enmity to God, as well as to them.' Bp. Patrick. (Notes, Gen. 4:6—9. 1 John 3:11, 12.)

V. 14, 15. Many of the people had concurred in Jehoram's idolatry; and some of them must have been instruments in his base, unnatural murders. They were therefore joined in his punishment, and he suffered by losing his subjects. (Note, 18—20.) 'All which calamities 'were threatened in the writing sent him in 'the name of Elijah, that he might not think 'they came by chance, but by the special direc-'tion of Almighty God, as a punishment of his 'wickedness.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 16, 17. The Philistines 'invaded him on 'the west side of his kingdom, as the Arabians 'did on the east side.' Bp. Patrick. (Note, 17: 11.) The spirit of these invaders was especially stirred up against Jehoram, and they do not seem to have done any great mischief to the country, or to Jerusalem. Having taken captive all his sons, except Jehoahaz, or Ahaziah, (names of similar meaning,) they put them to death. (Note, 22:1.)—Athaliah, the daughter of

CHAP. XXII.

Ahaziah succeeds Jehoram, reigns wickedly, joins Jehoram king of Israel, and is slain by Jehu, 1—9. Athaliah murders the seed royal, and usurps the throne, 10. Joash is preserved by Jehoshabeath, 11, 12.

AND [a] the inhabitants of Jerusalem made [b] Ahaziah his youngest son king in his stead: for the band of men that came with the Arabians to the camp had [c] slain all the eldest. So Ahaziah the son of Jehoram king of Judah reigned.

2 [d] Forty and two years old was Ahaziah when he began to reign, and he reigned one year in Jerusalem. His mother's name also was [e] Athaliah the daughter of Omri.

5 He [i] walked also after their counsel, and [k] went with Jehoram the son of Ahab king of Israel, to war against Hazael king of Syria at [l] Ramoth-gilead: and the Syrians smote Joram.

V. 18—20. Jehoram lived to witness the fulfilment of the other most afflictive particulars of Elijah's prophecy; and then he was seized with the predicted malady. (12—15. Notes, Deut. 28:61. Acts 12:20—23.) He was a young man, yet he could get no relief from the most painful and loathsome disease imaginable: and "he departed without being desired." No one regretted his death, as none had desired his recovery: but the idolaters, and even his dependents, were glad to be relieved from his tyranny: they therefore burnt no sweet spices in honor of him, and refused to bury him among their former kings. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The effects of sin may be very dreadful and durable, even when it does not prove finally destructive to him who committed it.—No means can ensure divine grace to our children; but intimate connexions with atrocious sinners almost render their ungodliness certain.—We are reminded to bless God for equitable rulers, a mild administration, and a limited and well arranged constitution of government; and to pray for a continuance of these blessings: for, notwithstanding the most prudent regulations, we may be suddenly and irreparably bereaved of them, unless God mercifully protect us.—Ambition, envy, and jealousy destroy natural affection, and convert men into savage monsters; when they have obtained power, and are afraid of losing it, and when "there is no fear of God before their eyes." In the mystery of Providence, such persons prosper for a time, and murder much wiser and better men than themselves: but the Lord has righteous purposes in permitting these events; part of which may now be discerned, and all the rest will be discovered by the light of the eternal world.—The vilest characters are, in some way, connected in the great chain of causes and effects: and are reserved to be undesignedly instrumental in carrying on the purposes of God, and in fulfilling his promises to his church and servants: or they are spared a while, for the sake of their relation to those, whom he delighteth to honor." But his plan will not long require them; their measure of iniquities will speedily be full, and then all their prosperity will end in ruin and despair.—The Lord, by one means or other, awfully reminds offenders of their guilt, and warns them of their danger: and those, who despise these admonitions, will experience the truth of them when it is too late, for, if neither judgments nor respites bring men to repentance, destruction cannot be far distant. —The dreadful torments and deaths of some murderers, persecutors, and other haughty criminals, who defy human justice, proclaim, that "verily there is a God, that judgeth the world;" and shew what all such enemies of God and man may expect, in the day of wrath and righteous vengeance. None need lament the departure of those who were plagues and tempters while they lived: and it may be right, in some cases, to withhold customary respect from them after their death; that other tyrants and persecutors, when surrounded by sycophants who flatter them in their crimes, may understand how they are despised and abhorred in the general sentiments of mankind. May the Lord enable us so to live, that we may have hope and comfort in the approach and agonies of death, and a joyful entrance into glory; and that our survivors may have to bless God for the benefit which they have received from us, and to regret our removal! Of this we should be ambitious, and such honor in some degree have all the saints of God.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXII. V. 1. The Arabians seem to have taken Jehoram's family captive, in the prospect of obtaining a ransom: but some band of men in their camp slew them; and thus defeated their purpose, but accomplished that of God. (Note, 21:16,17.)

V. 2—4. Forty and two. (2) As Jehoram was under forty years old when he died, it must be granted that this is an error of the transcribers, and that it should be twenty-two, as in Kings, (2 Kings 8:26.) and in some ancient versions.—Ahaziah was born when his father was eighteen years of age, yet he had several elder brethren: so that Jehoram must have been married to Athaliah when he was very young; and this circumstance rendered Jehoshaphat's conduct in this alliance still more blameable. (Note, 18:1.)

V. 5. Ahaziah 'would not imitate his grand-'father in that which was good in him: yet he 'followed his bad example, in joining with Ahab's 'son, as Jehoshaphat had with Ahab.' Bp. Patrick.—This propensity in human nature, not only to copy bad examples, but even to select the were given him at Ramah, when he fought with Hazael king of Syria. And [m] Azariah the son of Jehoram king of Judah went down [n] to see Jehoram the son of Ahab at Jezreel, because he was sick.

7 And the * destruction of Ahaziah [o] was of God by coming to Joram: for when he was come, [p] he went out with Jehoram against Jehu the son of Nimshi, whom [q] the LORD had anointed to cut off the house of Ahab.

8 And it came to pass, that [r] when Jehu was executing judgment upon the house of Ahab, and found the princes of Judah, and the sons of the brethren of Ahaziah, that ministered to Ahaziah, he slew them.

9 And [s] he sought Ahaziah; and they caught him, (for he was hid [t] in Samaria,) and brought him to Jehu: and when they had slain him, they buried him: [u] Because, said they, he is [x] the son of Jehoshaphat, who sought the LORD with all his heart. So [y] the house of Ahaziah had no power to keep still the kingdom.

10 ¶ But when [z] Athaliah the mother of Ahaziah saw that her son was dead, she arose and destroyed all the seed royal of the house of Judah.

11 But [a] Jehoshabeath the daughter of the king took Joash the son of Ahaziah, and stole him from among the king's sons that were slain, and put him and his nurse in a [b] bed-chamber. So Jehoshabeath the daughter of king Jehoram, the wife of [c] Jehoiada the priest, (for she was the sister of Ahaziah,) hid him from Athaliah, so that [d] she slew him not.

12 And he was with them [e] hid in the house of God six years: and [f] Athaliah reigned over the land.

CHAP. XXIII.

Jehoiada takes proper measures, and makes Joash king, 1—11. Athaliah is slain, 12—15. Jehoiada subverts idolatry; restores the worship of God, and places Joash on the throne, to the great joy of the people, 16—21.

AND in the [a] seventh year Jehoiada strengthened himself, and took the captains of hundreds, Azariah the son of Jehoram, and Ishmael the son of Jehohanan, and Azariah the son of Obed, and Maaseiah the son of Adaiah, and Elishaphat the son of Zichri, into [b] covenant with him.

2 And they [c] went about in Judah, and gathered the Levites out of all the cities of Judah, and [d] the chief of the fathers of Israel, and they came to Jerusalem.

bad part of good characters for imitation, is an awful and conclusive proof of deep depravity.

V. 6. (2 Kings 8:28,29.) The name given the king of Judah in this verse, though in the translation the difference is not great, yet it is greater in the original, and seems to have been a distinct name by which he was known. (אֲחַזְיָהוּ, Ahaziah; עֲזַרְיָהוּ, Azariah.)—It signifies the help of the LORD.

V. 7—9. (Notes, 2 Kings 9:21—28. 10:13, 14.) The Lord was pleased to commission Jehu, at this crisis, in order that Ahaziah might be involved in the righteous judgment, which was executed upon the house of Ahab.—Ahaziah lay concealed in the kingdom of Samaria, though not in the city so called. When he had seen Jehoram slain, he fled and endeavored to conceal himself in some part of that country: but Jehu ordered him to be pursued, and at length he was taken at Megiddo, and brought to Jehu, who caused him to be put to death. His servants were permitted, however, to carry his corpse to Jerusalem, and bury him, out of respect to the memory of Jehoshaphat his grandfather; while Jehoram was left unburied, in detestation of his father Ahab's enormous wickedness.

V. 10—12. Notes, 2 Kings 11:1—3.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

No tongue can express, no imagination can conceive, the guilt and condemnation of those parents, who counsel their own children to do wickedly, and who thus become their murderers in the most awful sense. Yet, this fatal calamity, to families and to society, is frequently the consequence of contracting marriages with those who are irreligious and wicked. But they, who are not previously disposed to ungodliness and vice, will not hearken to such pernicious counsellors: and neither the persuasion, authority, example, nor favor, even of a parent, is to be regarded, when the will and honor of God are concerned. But when men hate the truth and service of God, they are judicially left to be seduced and deceived, till their impolicy and impiety concur in bringing destruction upon them. None can flee, or hide himself, from that evil which pursueth sinners; or from those instruments, whom God employs to execute judgment upon his enemies: and the external respect paid to them, for the sake of pious ancestors, will not prevent the ruin of their own souls, or that of their families.—The most desperate and prosperous workers of iniquity, who are hardened against every natural affection, as well as all remains of the fear of God, can do no more than execute his righteous purposes: but he will not suffer his promises to be broken; and if infants, or pious persons, are permitted to be cut off in such unnatural massacres, he will set all right in the eternal world.

CHAP. XXIII. V. 1, 2. (Note, 2 Kings 11:4.) These "chief fathers of Israel" seem to have been the descendants of those priests and

3 And all the congregation [e] made a covenant with the king in the house of God. And he said unto them, Behold, the king's son shall reign, [f] as the LORD hath said of the sons of David.

4 This is the thing that ye shall do; A third part of you [g] entering on the sabbath, of the priests and of the Levites, shall be [h] porters of the * doors;

5 And a third part shall be at [i] the king's house; and a third part at [k] the gate of the foundation: and all the people shall be in the courts of the house of the LORD.

6 But let none come into the house of the LORD save the priests, and [l] they that minister of the Levites; they shall go in, for they are holy: but all the people shall keep the watch of the LORD.

7 And [m] the Levites shall compass the king round about, every man with his weapons in his hand; and [n] whosoever else cometh into the house, he shall be put to death: but be ye with the king when he cometh in, and when he goeth out.

8 So [o] the Levites and all Judah did according to all things that Jehoiada the priest had commanded, and took every man his men that were to come in on the sabbath, with them that were to go out on the sabbath: for Jehoiada the priest dismissed not [p] the courses.

9 Moreover Jehoiada the priest delivered to the captains of hundreds, [q] spears, and bucklers, and shields that had been king David's, which were in the house of God.

10 And he set all the people, every man having his weapon in his hand from the right † side of the temple to the left side of the temple, [r] along by the altar and the temple, by the king round about.

11 Then [s] they brought out the king's son, and [t] put upon him the crown, and gave him [u] the testimony, and made him king. And Jehoiada and his sons [x] anointed him, and said, ‡ God save the king.

12 ¶ Now [y] when Athaliah heard the noise of the people running and praising the king, [z] she came to the people into the house of the LORD:

13 And she looked, and, behold, [a] the king stood at his pillar at the entering in, [b] and the princes and the trumpets by the king: and [c] all the people of the land rejoiced, and [d] sounded with trumpets, also [e] the singers with instruments of music, and such as taught to sing praise. Then Athaliah rent her clothes, and said, § Treason, Treason.

14 Then Jehoiada the priest brought out the captains of hundreds that were set over the host, and said unto them, Have her forth of the ranges: and [f] whoso followeth her, let him be slain with the sword. For the priest said, [g] Slay her not in the house of the LORD.

15 So they laid hands on her: and when she was come to the entering [h] of the horse-gate, by the king's house, [i] they slew her there.

16 And Jehoiada [k] made a covenant between him, and between all the people, and between the king, [l] that they should be the LORD's people.

17 Then all the people went to [m] the house of Baal, and brake it down, and [n] brake his altars and his images in pieces, and [o] slew Mattan the priest of Baal before the altars.

18 Also Jehoiada appointed the officers of the house of the LORD, by the hand of the priests the Levites, [p] whom David had distributed in the house of the LORD, to offer the burnt-offerings of the LORD, [q] as it is written in the law of Moses, with rejoicing and with singing, as it was ordained ‖ by David.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord commonly effects great and important changes by those persons whom he has furnished with wisdom, courage, piety, and integrity; and who intend to do his will and promote his glory, and not to advance their own interests.—In the greatest emergencies, care ought to be taken that sacred things be not profaned; and that every one concur in a manner consistent with his character and calling: and as ministers are by profession holy persons, they should be careful to exhibit holy examples.—Civil transactions should be managed with a regard to the word and worship of God; and while men's hearts overflow with good wishes for their princes, commendations of them, or joy in their advancement; they should remember to conduct and terminate all in thanksgivings and praises unto God. This is peculiarly becoming, when persecuting tyrants and usurpers are removed, and equitable rulers come in their places: the work is the Lord's, whatever instruments he is pleased to employ. Such national mercies should be acknowledged by public reformations; and by a concurrence of all ranks, in solemnly yielding themselves up to be the Lord's people, and in establishing his worship and ordinances according to his word. Where this is neglected, the joy and singing, which takes place upon great deliverances, or the accession of kings to the throne, will commonly be short-lived, and will terminate in complaints, and discords, and calamities.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIV. V. 1—3. Note, 2 Kings 12: 2,3.—Took, &c. (3) The Jewish expositors are of opinion, that Jehoiada took these two wives for himself, not for Joash: and they consider this as inconsistent with the character of the high priest. But it is most obvious to understand the words, for him, of Joash: and Jehoiada's advanced age, at this time, renders it highly improbable that he should take them for himself: for he must, on any computation, have been above a hundred years old, when Joash began to reign. (Note, 15,16.) Nor are any sons of Jehoiada mentioned, afterwards, except such as were grown up.—It is not indeed expressly said that Jehoiada was high priest, but the way in which he is distinguished from the other priests, and the authority which he exercised, seem to Thus they did day by day, and gathered money in abundance.

12 And the king and Jehoiada [s] gave it to such as did the work of the service of the house of the LORD, and hired [t] masons and carpenters to repair the house of the LORD, and also such as wrought iron and brass to mend the house of the LORD.

V. 15, 16. Jehoiada was born in the reign of Solomon, and had lived through six successive reigns, besides Athaliah's usurpation; namely, those of Rehoboam, Abijah, Asa, Jehoshaphat, Jehoram, and Ahaziah. He was honorably interred among the kings of Judah: but the reason assigned for this extraordinary respect was much more honorable; and perhaps it was inscribed on his monument: "He has done good in Israel, both toward God, and toward his house."

He had eminently promoted true religion, and promoted the regular worship of God, and the repairs of the temple; in which the best interests of the people were greatly concerned. He had also been exceedingly useful in preserving the line of David in the person of Joash, and in terminating Athaliah's wicked usurpation. (Note, 31:10,21.)—Israel, the general name of the whole nation, is sometimes used when the kingdom of Judah is meant.

V. 17, 18. Jehoiada had acquired his influence over Joash during his childhood: and his near relation to the king, and the immense obligations, which he had conferred upon him, concurred with his age, gravity, reputation, piety, and wisdom, to support him in authority. So that, while he lived, neither Joash, nor his courtiers, ventured to follow, or even to declare, their inclinations to idolatry; but externally conformed to Jehoiada's regulations. As soon, however, as he was removed by death, they threw off the mask; and the nobles paid court to Joash, and perhaps flattered him. as at length freed from priestly dominion, tuition, grave lectures, and restraints, and as now a king indeed, and intimated, that he would have no objection to release the rigor of Jehoiada's administration, in matters of religion. Perhaps, they only proposed, that he should tolerate their sacrificing upon the high places, as more convenient and agreeable to them, than always coming to Jerusalem: but he, being won by their homage, as well as induced by his own inclinations, joined with them even in more gross and avowed idolatry; in consequence of which, they soon ex-

21 And they [q] conspired against him, and [r] stoned him with stones at the commandment of the king, in the court of the house of the LORD.

22 Thus Joash the king [s] remembered not the kindness which Jehoiada his father had done to him, but slew his son. And when he died, he said, [t] The LORD look upon it, and require it.

23 ¶ And it came to pass, †at the end of the year, that [u] the host of Syria came up against him: and they came to Judah and Jerusalem, and destroyed [x] all the princes of the people from among the people, and sent all the spoil of them unto the king of ‡ Damascus.

25 And when they were departed from him, (for they left him in [b] great diseases,) [c] his own servants conspired against him [d] for the blood of the sons of Jehoiada the priest, and slew him on his bed, and he died: and they buried him in the city of David, but they buried him [e] not in the sepulchres of the kings.

perienced the tokens of the divine displeasure. (Note, 2 Kings 12:17,18.)

V. 19—22. (Marg. Ref.) Both the king and his courtiers seem to have contemptuously disregarded the warnings of the prophets, first sent to them; so that they did not honor them even with hatred or persecution. But, at length, when they were assembled on account of some festival; (for the temple was not utterly forsaken;) the Spirit of God directed Zechariah to expostulate with them respecting their idolatry. Being the son of Jehoiada, a near relation to Joash, a chief priest, if not the high priest, he seemed to be the most unexceptionable person, who could possibly have been selected for the service: while his piety, and the meekness and reasonableness of his plain address and warning, combined in entitling him to a favorable hearing, and evidenced his admonition to be seasonable. "The Spirit of God clothed him." (marg.) 'He 'had a divine motion to speak publicly to the 'people and to reprove them, which that he 'might do and be heard of all, he got up into an 'high place, where they might all both see and 'hear him.' Bp. Patrick. But all this was in vain; the enraged apostate, who hated reproof, ordered him to be stoned, and the unprincipled people, as if joined in a preconcerted conspiracy against God and his servants, with one accord executed the unrighteous sentence, even in the court of the temple! (23:14,15. Note, 2 Kings 11:13—16.)—It is scarcely possible that a murder could contain more aggravated injustice and impiety: but the ingratitude of Joash is peculiarly noticed. Many, who have cast off all fear of God, retain some regard to their earthly benefactors; but this base man was lost to every thing, which had the least semblance of good.—Zechariah's dying words would be best rendered, "The LORD will look upon it and require it:" a a prophecy, and not a prayer. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Matt. 23:29—36.) The event soon ver ified this prediction. (Note, 23,24.) 'It is likel 'that he was a younger son of Jehoiada.... Ludo 'vicus Capellus therefore thinks, that his brothe 'the high priest conniving at Joash's apostacy 'this younger brother was inspired of God to re 'prove it, which boldness Joash and his courtier 'thought they might punish with some color, .. 'which they stirred up the people to chastise. .. Patrick.*

V. 23, 24. (Note, 17,18.) A small company sent by Hazael plundered Jerusalem, and sen the spoil to Hazael at Damascus. They likewis "destroyed all the princes of the people;" the ver persons, who seduced Joash into idolatry. CHAP. XXV.

Amaziah at first reigns well, and justly punishes his father's murderers, 1—4. He gathers a great army, and hires, for a hundred talents, a hundred thousand Israelites against Edom: but, having paid the money, he dismisses them at the word of a prophet; and they depart in great anger, 5—10. He smites the Edomites, and exercises great cruelty towards the captives, 11, 12. The Israelites, on their return, spoil the cities of Judah, 13. Amaziah serves the gods of Edom, and rejects the admonitions of a prophet, 14—16. He challenges Joash, who in vain warns him: he is vanquished, and Jerusalem spoiled, 17—24. 'contempt into which he was fallen.' Bp. Patrick. Joash seems to have murdered some other sons of Jehoiada, perhaps lest they should avenge the death of Zechariah.—Whether the conspirators intended to punish Joash for this murder, or were actuated by private resentment or ambition; God was pleased to use them as executioners of his righteous vengeance. They were both born of foreign women: the idolatrous kings perhaps encouraged such forbidden marriages; but in this case they proved fatal to Joash. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

The best education, the most scriptural instructions, and the brightest examples, are insufficient of themselves to convert the soul: they are, however, the general means by which the Lord works; and even, when not eventually successful to change the sinner's heart, they commonly produce effects salutary to the community.—Hypocrites often shew extraordinary zeal for externals, but they foolishly neglect the heart.—The reluctancy of men to part with their money, for pious and charitable uses, is increased by the avarice of many, through whose hands it should pass, and who basely intercept it: but exact fidelity and punctuality, in shewing that it has been, or will be, expended for the end proposed, go far towards inducing men to contribute liberally in a good cause; and this alone can afford comfort upon reflection, or bring honor upon a man's character.—If we live to the glory of God, and endeavor to do good to men, especially in the great concerns of salvation; we may be satisfied that we have lived long enough, though we should die young; or we may be willing to linger out many years in infirm old age, if the Lord has any thing for us to do. But, whenever or however we pass from time into eternity, may we leave such a testimony in the consciences of our survivors, that if they were required to make an inscription for our tomb, they might be constrained to write; "He did good to Israel, both toward God, and toward his house." It is true, that many, who are overawed by the personal qualities, the rank, or the reputation of eminent men, secretly hate their piety, and are weary of their authority. But a good conscience, the assurance of usefulness, and the approbation of God, may enable a man to disregard these painful effects of superior excellency.

V. 17—27.

The authority or influence of parents, ministers, and pious friends, joined with transient serious impressions, and other incidental circumstances, may produce, and long maintain, a plausible profession of religion: but the lamp will go out when it is especially wanted; unless supplied from the oil in the vessel, the grace of God possessing the heart. (Notes and P. O. Matt. 25:1—13.)—When a man is under the power of pride and worldly passions, he disrelishes those counsels, from which he has received the most important temporal advantage, and which tend to his eternal good: and then flattery, licentious liberty, arbitrary authority, and the most impious proposals, will be more welcome, because congenial to his judgment and affections. But he, who has not sense to direct his own conduct, and is too proud to take good advice, will soon be proved a fool, let who will flatter his wisdom.—"This is the love of God, to keep his commandments, and his commandments are not grievous." Yet the yoke of external obedience is very uneasy to the carnal mind; and, in this case, men will secretly rejoice, and perhaps openly congratulate one another, upon the death of pious monitors, or even parents. But impiety brings wrath, especially when consequent to apostacy, on such as cast off the fear of God.—No caution, tenderness, or gentleness, consistent with faithfulness; no respectability of character, eminent services, or personal obligations, can secure the ministers of God from persecution, if they rouse the dormant conscience, contradict the haughty spirit, or excite disquietude in sin: and, except their word be accompanied with the converting grace of God, the sinner will rage, in proportion to his power, pride, or impiety.—Some regard to justice, decency, and gratitude, may be expected from ignorant and profligate characters, and from infidels and heathen idolaters: but the rage of an apostate bursts all obligations and restraints; for he has so done violence to his conscience, that it has lost all its energy; and, except he be restrained by human laws, every thing desperate may be expected from his resentment. The testimony of faithful ministers will, however, be accepted by God, when rejected by men; and he will recompense to them all their losses and sufferings for his sake.—Those who transgress the commandments of the Lord, cannot prosper, whatever they may presumptuously suppose; and when they forsake God, he will forsake them. Without the Spirit of prophecy, we may confidently foretel, that the Lord will look upon, and require, all the persecutions, slanders, mockeries, and ill usage, which his servants meet with, except their prayers be answered, and he give the persecutors repentance and better minds.—The Lord can soon find such as will, for their own purposes, execute judgment upon murderers, and other atrocious criminals, however exalted; nor can any power avail against those, into whose hands he delivers his enemies to be punished. Then, superiority in station only ensures precedency in suffering: and how dreadful is it when a painful and miserable death transmits the impenitent rebel to a more miserable eternity! God help us to be in earnest, to take warning, to be upright in heart, and to persevere unto the end! that, having lived by faith, and in humble, devoted obedience, we may at length "die the death of the righteous, and that our last end may be like his!"

NOTES.

CHAP. XXV. V. 1, 2. Notes, 14—16. 26:4. 2 Kings 14:1—4.

V. 3, 4. (Notes, 24:25,26.) Even if the conspirators against Joash intended to avenge upon him the murder of Zechariah, they acted without a commission from that God, "to whom vengeance belongeth;" and were justly put to death for treason and murder. (Note, 2 Kings 14:5,6.)

V. 5. Nearly four times as many soldiers had been numbered in the days of Jehoshaphat. (Note, 17:13—19.) The inhabitants of the land must have vastly decreased during the late reigns, in consequence of their wickedness, and as a punishment of it. But, perhaps, numbers were unwilling to enlist under Amaziah: and either he did not attempt to force them, or they found means to evade his inquiries. His army, however, seems to have been sufficiently numerous to reduce the revolted Edomites, against whom he was preparing to make war. (11,12.)

V. 6—10. If Amaziah had previously consulted God, all the painful consequences of the measure which he adopted would have been prevented. —As a hundred talents would not divide above eight shillings apiece, among one hundred thousand men; we may suppose that it was only an earnest of their pay, or that they expected to be enriched with the plunder of the Edomites. —The kingdom of Israel was openly idolatrous, and the Lord would not have Judah join alliance with them. Perhaps the army which Amaziah had hired, was chiefly of the tribe of Ephraim; or that tribe, being the most considerable in the kingdom of Israel, is put for the whole.—As the Lord was not with the men of Ephraim, he declared by his prophet that he would not prosper Amaziah, if he employed them: and if, after this prohibition, he would persist in taking them with him, he was warned, that God would make him fall before the enemy: for he could help him without the aid of idolaters; and he could cast him down, though he thus made himself "strong for the battle." (Notes, Is. 8:9,10. Joel 3:9—17.) And as for the hundred talents, which he had given to the Israelites, and could not recover, and which he was unwilling to lose; the Lord was able to give him much more than that, 'and, as Grotius observes, he is rich enough, who 'is impoverished for God's sake.' Bp. Patrick. —Amaziah, though destitute of true faith, paid so much regard to the Lord's message, that he discharged the hired army: and they were exceedingly offended at the affront put upon them, in being sent away as the enemies of God; and perhaps also by the disappointment of their avaricious or ambitious expectations.

V. 11, 12. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 2 Kings 14:7.) No intimation is given, on what account, or for what provocation, this most cruel conduct towards the prisoners of war was adopted. The enmity between Israel and Esau seems to have been reciprocal, and deeply malignant The victorious king and his army considered every ria even unto [s] Beth-horon, and smote three thousand of them, and took much spoil.

14 ¶ Now it came to pass, after that Amaziah was come from the slaughter of the Edomites, that [t] he brought the gods of the children of Seir, and set them up to be [u] his gods, and bowed down himself before them, and burned incense unto them.

15 Wherefore the anger of the LORD was kindled against Amaziah, and he sent unto him [x] a prophet, which said unto him, [y] Why hast thou sought after [z] the gods of the people, [a] which could not deliver their own people out of thine hand?

16 And it came to pass, as he talked with him, that the king said unto him, [b] Art thou made of the king's counsel? [c] forbear: why shouldest thou be smitten? Then the prophet forbare, and said, I know that God [d] hath * determined to destroy thee, because thou hast done this, and hast not hearkened unto my counsel.

17 ¶ Then [e] Amaziah king of Judah took advice, and sent to Joash, the son of Jehoahaz, the son of Jehu, king of Israel, saying, Come, [f] let us see one another in the face.

18 And Joash king of Israel sent to Amaziah king of Judah, saying, The [†] thistle that was in Lebanon sent to the cedar that was in Lebanon, saying, Give thy daughter to my son to wife: and there passed by [‡] a wild beast that was in Lebanon, and trode down the thistle.

19 Thou sayest, Lo, thou hast smitten the Edomites; and [g] thine heart lifteth thee up [h] to boast: abide now at home; [i] why shouldest thou meddle to thine hurt, that thou shouldest fall, even thou, and Judah with thee?

20 But Amaziah would not hear: for [k] it came of God, that he might deliver them into the hand of their enemies, because they sought after the gods of Edom.

21 So Joash the king of Israel went up, and they [l] saw one another in the face, both he and Amaziah king of Judah, at [m] Beth-shemesh, which belongeth to Judah.

22 And Judah was [§] put to the worse before Israel, and they [n] fled every man to his tent.

23 And Joash the king of Israel [o] took Amaziah king of Judah, the son of Joash, the son of [p] Jehoahaz, at Beth-shemesh, and brought him to Jerusalem, and brake down the wall of Jerusalem, from the [q] gate of Ephraim to the [‖] corner-gate, four hundred cubits.

24 And he took [r] all the gold and the silver, and all the vessels that were found individual of Edom, as a traitor and a rebel; and so adjudged them to death, and acted according to that judgment. But their conduct was wholly inexcusable, and could only perpetuate rancor to future generations, and provoke the surviving Edomites to cruel retaliations whenever they had it in their power.

V. 13. The Israelites seem to have returned home, when discharged by Amaziah, as his powerful army deterred them from attempting revenge at that time: but when he was engaged in war with the Edomites, they took the opportunity, marched from Samaria, and plundered all the cities till they came to Beth-horon, where they slew three thousand of the inhabitants.—Amaziah had indeed dismissed these auxiliaries in obedience to God; but his savage cruelty to the prisoners of Edom, and his subsequent idolatry, (Note, 14—16.) proved that he acted by constraint or terror, when he was obedient: he therefore received for his complicated misconduct a just rebuke. Had he broken the idols to pieces, and treated the prisoners with clemency; he might have expected comfort in his success, and not experienced such painful effects from dismissing the Israelites.—Perhaps the cities, which were destroyed on this occasion, being in the vicinity of Israel, were infected with idolatry.

V. 14—16. Ahaz, who worshipped the idols of Syria by whom he was vanquished, was not so senseless as Amaziah, who sought unto the gods of Edom, which could not deliver them from his cruelty. (Note, 28:22,23.) 'Perhaps Amaziah 'worshipped them from fear they should owe him 'a spite, and contrive some mischief against him, 'in revenge of what he had done against the 'Edomites.' Bp. Patrick. But Amaziah, who had borne with the prophet, who spoke to him concerning dismissing the Israelites, by which he lost one hundred talents, was so mad upon his idols, that he would not endure that subject to be insisted on.—He seems to have menaced the prophet with Zechariah's doom; and thus he made himself a sharer in the guilt of that atrocious murder. (Note, 24:19—22.) The prophet was a counsellor, whom the Lord had appointed him: and none of those, whom he had chosen for himself, gave him such honest, wise, and salutary counsel. But, as he would not hearken to it, the prophet desisted, having most solemnly warned him that the Lord had counselled to dein the house of God, with Obed-edom, and the treasures of the king's house, the hostages also, and returned to Samaria.

25 ¶ And Amaziah, the son of Joash king of Judah, lived after the death of [s] Joash, son of Jehoahaz king of Israel, fifteen years.

V. 17—24. Notes, 2 Kings 14:8—14.—Took advice, &c. V. 25—27. (Note, 2 Kings 14:17—20.) No intimation is given, that Amaziah repented during the whole space of the Lord's long-suffering. Probably he added tyranny and oppression to his idolatry: and this, with his imprudent and unsuccessful administration, rendered him so odious, that he was slain, as it appears, by the general consent of his subjects, and no one was called to account for his death.—He was, however, buried with the other kings of Judah. (Notes, 21:18—20. 24:15,16.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—10.

Many favor and support religion from motives of policy, who either do not appear, or who only appear, to be religious; but the Lord has no pleasure in dissemblers.—Traitors and murderers are sometimes so powerful, as, for a time, to set justice at defiance; but they will at length find those, who are able to execute righteous vengeance upon them. In every case, however, the law of God should be adhered to, as our perfect rule of duty.—Unrepented sin will inevitably and finally ruin every one who continues in it: and in like manner it will infallibly enfeeble those nations where it prevails, and diminish their prosperity and consequence. Princes and statesmen professing Christianity, when forming alliances, or stipulating succors from foreign courts, seldom inquire, whether "the LORD be with them" or not. Indeed, the very question would too generally excite ridicule and disgust: and yet this will be found of far greater efficacy, in the success of wars, and the prosperity of kingdoms, than the most sagacious ungodly devices. It is indeed certain, that no enterprise, public or private, should be engaged in, without seeking to know the will of God concerning it; if we would avoid those distressing consequences, which often follow from even the most politic measures. But no confederates are so dangerous as apostates.—Success cannot reasonably be expected by those, who act in defiance of the divine commands: they may be "strong for the battle," or for the business; but, if God is pleased "to make them fall," their strength will avail nothing; for he has power to help, and to cast down: and if men prosper in presumptuous wickedness, their success is the prelude of their ruin.—When those who have not true faith, or a spiritual mind, are convinced of the sinfulness of any part of their conduct or pursuits, they always object to self-denying obedience; and seem to say, "But what shall we do for the hundred talents?" 'What shall we do, if, by hallowing the sabbath, 'we lose so many good customers? What shall 'we do, if we renounce this illegal traffic and 'exorbitant profit, to compensate so important a 'loss? What shall we do, if we affront our friends, 'obstruct our preferment, or lose the friendship 'of the world? How shall we maintain our families? "What shall we eat? or what shall we 'drink? or wherewithal shall we be clothed?" 'Penury and distress face us in the way which 'you point out to us: we are almost persuaded it 'is the road to heaven; but what shall we do 'about the expenses of the journey?' Here numbers stumble and turn aside, or endeavor to quiet their conscience in a vain pretence, that such and such practices are necessary in their case; that the precept must be dispensed with: in short, their meaning is, however they may disguise it from others, and even from themselves, that by them, circumstanced as they are, both God and Mammon may be served; and that they may be Christ's disciples without "denying themselves, taking up the cross, and forsaking all for him." But the answer to such objections is obvious: "The LORD is able to give thee much more than this;" and he has promised to "add all other things" to those, "who seek first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness:" yea, to make up a hundred fold, even in this present world, all that has been conscientiously renounced for his sake and the gospel: and we are "compassed about with an innumerable cloud of witnesses" of his faithfulness to this promise. Unbelief, however, will trust the Lord no further, than it can understand in what way he will fulfil his word: but faith approves the security, and gives him full credit for his truth, power, and love; and makes every sacrifice, and ventures every consequence, in dependence on his word, and in obedience to his command. He, who in this way is reduced to poverty, is enriched for ever; and he may set down his largest losses as his most certain gains, assured, that "no good thing will the LORD withhold from those who walk uprightly."—Yet, a single instance of self-denying obedience, performed on a sudden, under some vehement impression, does not prove that a man has true faith. A person, on a sudden emotion, might cut off his hand, in any cause, and upon reflection repent of it ever after: but the deliberate daily renouncing of the world, and opposing our strongest sinful inclinations, (though as painful to part with, as a right hand, or a right eye,) for the sake of the gospel, and in obedience to the Savior, forms the constant evidence of an interest in him, and all his precious promises; (Notes, Phil. 3:1—11, v. 7—9.) and to some measure of this temper and conduct every true believer has attained. But, the behavior of the mere professor of true religion will frequently detect the hypocrisy of his obedience in particular instances, and justify God in punishing his other crimes, by the very consequences of that obedience.

V. 11—28.

Those who are evidently and consciously irreligious, are yet often much offended with being treated as such: and affronted pride, united with disappointed rapacity, kindles a resentment, from which the most fatal effects may be expected.—Abused mercies occasion man's most aggravated wickedness, and accelerate his ruin: so that, when we are prospered by Providence, we should be peculiarly careful what return we make for the goodness of God, and what use we make of his bounty.—"The tender mercies of the wicked are cruel;" and none are so imperious and inhuman towards those who oppose their will, as they who dare to bid defiance to the authority of the Almighty.—The absurdities of superstition and idolatry, to which the human race has in all ages shewn so strange a propensity, are as disgraceful to the understanding as to the heart: and if we did but consider how unavailing those worldly objects, which we are apt to idolize, have always proved, to the peace, safety, and happiness of their possessors; the reflection must check our eager pursuits of wealth, honor, or sensual pleasure; or at least shew them to be as irrational, as the worship of useless, helpless idols.—They, who are mad upon their lusts, will not bear control or counsel: and he, who would expostulate with them for their good, may expect to be treated as impertinent, intermeddling, or insolent: especially if an inferior venture to admonish, in the name of the Lord, sinners of superior rank and station. These, indeed, seem generally to claim it as one of their prerogatives, to walk unmolested in "the broad way that leadeth to destruction:" and ridicule or menaces will be the recompense of him, who dares to warn them that it is a dangerous road. But, after all the contempt and obloquy to which such counsellors are exposed, the event demonstrates, that princes generally hearken to those who are far worse: and, though assuming churchmen have often disgraced their profession; yet no man, from the throne to the alms-house, will have cause to repent attending to the warnings, instructions, and counsel of the few, who honestly declare the truth and will of God, without courting the favor, fearing the frown, or respecting the person of any man. If, however, mild, serious, rational, and scriptural reproof is proudly rejected and resented, we are not required further to urge our admonitions, but must desist, by plainly giving men to understand what the consequence will be.—When the remonstrances of conscience are silenced, and the ministers of God are rejected and menaced, it is to be feared that he has determined upon the sinner's destruction; and if he also says, "Let him alone," "my Spirit shall not always strive with him;" he will be given up to strong delusion, to increasing vain-confidence, infatuated projects, rash intermeddling, and obstinate perseverance in a course of folly, till the measure of his wickedness is filled up, and "destruction from the Almighty" comes upon him. Thus "a man's pride shall bring him low;" his ruin may be dated from his turning away from the Lord; and the longer he is spared, the more will he "treasure up wrath against the day of wrath, and revelation of the righteous judgment of God, who shall render to every man according to his works." May the Lord preserve us from this dreadful doom, and prepare our hearts to receive his truth, to welcome his counsels and reproofs, and obediently to submit to his authority, and do his will!

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVI. V. 1—3. Notes, 2 Kings 14:21, 22. 15:1—7, v. 1—5.

V. 4. Uzziah, or Azariah, began his reign much better than he ended it, as Amaziah had done. But he seems to have supported the worship of God all his days; and he is never charged with idolatry, or any kind of immorality. (Notes, 25:14—16. 2 Kings 14:3,4.) His reign must therefore have been very happy for his people, and favorable to the interests of religion, though the close of it proved disgraceful to himself.

V. 5. It is not known of what tribe or family this Zechariah was; though some conjecture, that he was the son of that Zechariah whom Joash murdered. This, however, would be a singular instance in Scripture, of a son called by his father's name.—He was perhaps endued with a peculiar gift in distinguishing between those, who were actually favored with prophetic visions, and those who only pretended to be so. (1 against the Philistines, and brake down [m] the wall of Gath, and the wall of Jabneh, and the wall of Ashdod, and built cities * about Ashdod, and among the Philistines.

7 And [n] God helped him against the Philistines, and against [o] the Arabians that dwelt in Gur-baal, and the Mehunims.

8 And [p] the Ammonites gave gifts to Uzziah: and [q] his name [†] spread abroad even to the entering in of Egypt; for he strengthened himself exceedingly.

9 Moreover Uzziah built towers in Jerusalem at the [r] corner-gate, and at [s] the valley-gate, and at [t] the turning of the wall, and [‡] fortified them.

10 Also he built towers in the desert, and [§] digged many wells: for [u] he had much cattle, both in the low country and in the plains; husbandmen also, and vine-dressers in the mountains, and in [‖] Carmel: for he loved [¶] husbandry.

11 ¶ Moreover Uzziah had an host of fighting men, that [x] went out to war by bands, according to the number of their account, by the hand of Jeiel the scribe, and Maaseiah the ruler, under the hand of Hananiah, one of the king's captains.

12 The whole number of the chief of the fathers of the mighty men of valor were two thousand and six hundred.

13 And under their hand was  an army, [y] three hundred thousand and seven thousand and five hundred, that made war with mighty power, to help the king against the enemy.

14 And Uzziah prepared for them, throughout all the host, shields, and spears, and helmets, and habergeons, and bows, and [††] slings to cast stones.

15 And he made in Jerusalem engines, invented by [z] cunning men, to be on the towers, and upon the bulwarks, to shoot arrows and great stones withal: and his name [‡‡] spread far abroad; for he was marvellously helped till he was strong.

[Practical Observations.]

16 ¶ But [a] when he was strong, his heart was lifted up to his destruction; for he transgressed against the LORD his God, and [b] went into the temple of the LORD [c] to burn incense upon the altar of incense.

17 And [d] Azariah the priest went in after him, and with him fourscore priests of the LORD, that were [e] valiant men:

18 And they [f] withstood Uzziah the king, and said unto him, It appertaineth [g] not unto thee, Uzziah, to burn incense unto the LORD, but [h] to the priests the sons of Aaron, that are consecrated to burn incense: go out of the sanctuary; for thou hast trespassed; [i] neither shall it be for thine honor from the LORD God.

19 Then Uzziah was wroth, and had a censer in his hand to burn incense; and while [k] he was wroth with the priests, [l] the leprosy even rose up in his forehead, before the priests in the house of the LORD, from beside the incense-altar.

Cor. 12:10.) At least he was well acquainted with divine things, an intelligent, prudent, pious, and heavenly-minded man; and an instructer, or counsellor, to Uzziah, who prospered by hearkening to his admonitions: whilst Amaziah, who had scorned to be counselled by a prophet, followed advice which brought him to destruction. V. 16—23. Uzziah had been remarkably prospered in every thing; but pride, instead of gratitude, was fostered by it: so that, deeming himself at least as much favored as the priests were, he thought it a reproach to him to be excluded from any part of the temple, or the worship of God.—Burning incense was the most honorable part of the sacerdotal office, and of that he became ambitious. (Note, Lev. 10:1,2.) The law had forbidden any, but the priests of the family of Aaron, to enter the sanctuary, or to burn incense; and the fate of Korah and his company, was an awful example upon record, of the consequences to be expected from violating that statute. (Notes, Num. 16: 17:) But perhaps Uzziah was tempted to disbelieve these ancient records; imagining that they had been falsified by the priests to keep up their own consequence; or that the law was now become obsolete: and he might be confirmed in this, by considering that nothing of the kind had taken place for many centuries. Thus "his heart was lifted up to his destruction;" his crime exposed him to eternal destruction, as well as present death; and though he was respited, yet his remaining days were spent, as it were, in a lingering ignominious execution.—None of the former kings of Judah had attempted to burn incense in the temple; none, perhaps, to invade the sacerdotal office in any way: though many of them had offended by forsaking the worship of God. Had Uzziah contented himself with imitating David, Solomon, and Jehoshaphat, in instructing, and praying with and for his people, he would have done commendably.—The idolatrous kings indeed burned incense to their idols, and it seems he took them for his pattern in this instance, though he would not forsake the God of Israel. (Note, 1 Kings 13:1.)—Azariah and the other priests behaved nobly on this occasion: (Note, 2 Kings 16: 10—16.) they opposed the king's design, not with violence or reproachful language, but with plain scriptural remonstrances, precepts, and counsels; and by warning him, that his attempt would expose him to disgrace from the LORD God. (Note, 1 Chr. 6:4—15, v. 10.) Yet he was insensible to their arguments, and enraged by their faithful opposition: and Josephus writes that he threatened them with death, when an extraordinary earthquake preceded his being smitten with leprosy. (Notes, Amos 1:1. Zech. 14:4,5.) But, however that might be, when he found that this divine judgment was inflicted upon him, and was conspicuous in his forehead, he became sensible of his sin and danger, and yielded to the priests who hurried him out of the sanctuary, yea hasted to retreat, perhaps dreading still further judgments. It pleased God to continue this stigma upon him during the remainder of his life: and, in consequence, he was excluded from the precincts of the temple; from society, except that of the priests into whose office he had intruded; and from the exercise of his regal authority. It is not said how long this occurred before his death: but the age of Jotham, when he began to reign, implies, that it was late in Uzziah's reign, before he was smitten with the leprosy: and his reign must be considered as a very prosperous one for his kingdom. But, by aspiring after that honor which did not belong to him, he lost all his dignity and reputation, and was, in some sense, degraded beneath the meanest of his subjects, and even after his death, notwithstanding his good and prosperous reign, he was, as a leper, excluded from the sepulchres of the kings.—Yet the long-suffering of God gave him space for repentance: and his patient and quiet submission to this severe rebuke, and to all its most painful consequences, (as they must have been to so honorable and prosperous a monarch,) forms no inconsiderable proof of his repentance; and implies that his retirement was well improved, and his death happy. (2 Kings 15:1—7.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS

V. 1—15.

Wise and pious instructers are an invaluable treasure to young people; especially to those, who are advanced to exalted stations, and who are generally poisoned with the flattery of interested sycophants and dependents. Yet, unless they seek and serve God from an inward principle of piety; they will at length lose, or shake off, their preceptors and their religion together.—Many have experienced, and some have confessed, that, when they paid regard to the service of God, they prospered; but that every thing went wrong, from the time they grew negligent in religion. Indeed, external prosperity does not now so uniformly attend godliness, as it did in the case of Israel: yet every undertaking will succeed with the true Christian, as far as it is good for him; and God will help and prosper him in his spiritual warfare, in proportion to the simplicity of his dependence and obedience. —No lawful business will be the worse managed, or prove less pleasant to any man, on account of his diligence in the service of God, if he have learned to arrange his temporal and spiritual concerns in due order.—It would be happy for mankind, if able and powerful monarchs took more delight, and spent more of their leisure hours, in rural occupations, which are manly, useful, and truly honorable: but hitherto man's chief ambition, exertion, and ingenuity, have been directed to the destruction of his own species! If, however, it must be a part of his occupation to invent and forge instruments of destruction, and of shortening the already contracted duration of human life; surely these should be used only in self-defence, or in awing the turbulent spirits of those public depredators, who cannot otherwise be prevented from disturbing the world.

V. 16—23.

It is written, as with a sun-beam, that prosperity is most dangerous to fallen man. Some are "lifted up" by it "to their destruction," others to their deep disgrace and lasting distress: and we have all more cause to pray to be preserved from its fascinating influence, than from the depth of poverty, or from the anguish of the severest disappointment and afflictions.—The narrow way is one and straight; but the paths of transgression are numerous and various: and new ones are continually struck out, by the perverse ingenuity and presumption of rebellious man. Extremes are on every side. To avoid enthusiasm and credulity, men become profane and infidel; and, in shunning infidelity, they rush into superstition. Those who are not chargeable with immorality or gross profaneness, may yet provoke the Lord by their hypocrisy or self-righteous pride. We are not indeed, at present, kept at that awful distance from sacred things, which the people of God formerly were: yet let us not suppose, that we are in no danger of offending in this way. The sacred ministry may be intruded into, with a presumption and impiety bordering upon sacrilege and blasphemy; while mercenary and ungodly men make those professions, engagements, and protestations, in the presence of God, "for filthy lucre's sake," which they deride as enthusiastic or superstitious! The Lord's table may be approached in hypocrisy, pride, unbelief, and impenitency; or even as a step to preferment, by infidels and debauchees who are the slaves to every lust! and in many ways men may be guilty of most awful and presumptuous profanations. Against these abuses the ministers of God must caution all persons, however wealthy, honorable, or powerful, with plain declarations of the truths and precepts of Scripture, and solemn warnings respecting the consequences of transgression. Yet, alas! few are found, who are valiant men, that dare, in meekness and faithfulness, oppose the powerful who attempt the most scandalous profanations; and venture all the consequences of their displeasure in refusing to concur in them. But the Lord will assuredly stand by those few, and mark their opposers with evident tokens of his anger.—No wonder that ungodly men are so enraged at opposition from the ministers of God; for even believers at some times cannot endure it. But his rebuke brings them to themselves, and they then make haste to renounce their wayward purposes; submit patiently to his severest corrections; and are humbled for the pride of their hearts. And, whatever humiliating or disgraceful events take place; however we may be excluded from the earthly courts of the Lord, 'the communion of his 'saints,' and the comforts of society; if we are brought to true repentance, and at length obtain eternal life, we shall bless God for the whole. (Notes and P. O. Dan. 4:28—37.) But the Lord always resists the proud; and contempt, either on earth or in hell, is the never failing consequence of self-confidence and arrogance. When, however, the Lord sees good to throw prosperous and useful men aside, as a broken vessel; if he raises up their children, or other able persons, to fill their places, that the community be not losers, they may rejoice in renouncing all worldly concerns, and in employing the remnant of their days in preparing for death and heaven.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Ahaz reigns very wickedly, 1—4. He is defeated with terrible slaughter of his army by the kings of Syria and Israel, 5—7. The Israelites lead to Samaria an immense number of captives, 8. The people are induced, by the remonstrance of a prophet, and the interference of the princes, to treat them kindly and send them home, 9—15. Ahaz, attacked by the Edomites and Philistines, sends to the king of Assyria, but receives no benefit from his assistance, 16—21. In his distress he adds to his idolatries, 22—25. chronicles of Israel, as well as in those of Judah; though but little has been transmitted to us concerning him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The severest judgments of God have mercy connected with them, either to the persons themselves, or to others, who thence learn caution and circumspection.—It ought to be the constant aim of every one of us, to imitate the faith, piety, equity, kindness, self-denial, patience, and meekness, of those servants of God with whom we are acquainted, and of whom we read or hear; and carefully to avoid their failings, and the sins into which they have been betrayed: but the reverse of this is general, and natural to mankind.—If we would attain to eminence in godliness or usefulness, we must diligently "prepare our ways before the LORD our God;" acting habitually as under his inspection, and depending on his assistance and merciful acceptance, from love to his name and zeal for his glory.—Many pious men have not fortitude or vigor to combat the difficulties, which must be expected by those, who attempt reformation, in opposition to inveterate prejudices, errors, superstitions, and immoralities; yet all in public stations should remember, that this is incumbent upon them, and forms that improvement of their talents, which God requires. They should therefore "arise, and be doing," according to the duties of their situations, "and the LORD will be with them for good."—But even when the most unexceptionable example is united to the most strenuous and persevering endeavors, the success of pious reformers will not answer their desires and expectations. Many of "the people will still do corruptly:" and, in righteous displeasure against those who hate to be reformed, the Lord often prematurely removes wise, prosperous, and pious rulers in church or state; and sends others, whose follies and vices severely punish a people, who did not value their mercies till they were withdrawn from them.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVIII. V. 1—4. Marg. Ref.—Notes, 2 Kings 16:3,4. Lev. 20:2—5. Matt. 5:21,22, v. 22.

V. 5. JEHOVAH was 'the God of Ahaz,' as his Creator, Upholder, and Governor; as Ahaz was born among the professing and covenant-people of God, dedicated to him by circumcision, and educated in a religious manner; as he reigned over Judah, where alone the worship of God was instituted; and as he was bound by every obligation to serve and obey him. But he was not 'the 'God of Ahaz,' as he is the God of true believers, according to the covenant of grace; he was not Ahaz's Portion and Salvation: nor was Ahaz the Lord's servant and worshipper, for he was a most wicked apostate and idolater. In short, he had not the privilege of having "the LORD for his God," his "Shield, and exceeding great Reward;" but he had the guilt of violating the strongest obligations to his service; and of continuing impenitent and ungodly, in the midst of every advantage and means of grace. Had he been born and educated a heathen, he might perhaps have escaped remarkable judgments: but, as he was an apostate, "the LORD his God" delivered him to be punished, into the hands of the Syrians and Israelites. (Notes, 2 Kings 16:5—9.) His people also were involved in the same guilt, and in the same punishment. They did corruptly under pious Jotham: for their correction Jotham was removed, and wicked Ahaz succeeded; and his idolatry and enormous crimes were punished by dreadful havoc made among his subjects. Thus, the sins and sufferings of kings and people resemble the case of the human body; in which the head must share the sufferings of the members, and the members those of the head, by reason of that unity which subsists between them. (Note, 2 Sam. 24:1,2. P. O. 1—9.)

V. 6—8. This is the greatest slaughter of the men of Judah that we read of. (13:17.) And, as they were "all valiant men," and Israel was not in a very prosperous state, the defeat of Judah with such tremendous slaughter must be ascribed to some supernatural terror or confusion. "Because they had forsaken the Lord," 'who therefore forsook them, and took away 'their courage, that they could make no resist-'ance.' Bp. Patrick. Ahaz himself escaped: but he had a son and two of his chief officers slain, one of whom was next under him in authority; and an immense spoil, and multitude of prisoners, were collected from the defenceless country by the rapacious victors. It does not appear, however, that Jerusalem was taken by them. (Notes, Is. 7:1—9.)

V. 9—11. The Lord, provoked with Judah's idolatries, had delivered them into the hands of their still more idolatrous brethren, who had shewn the most exorbitant rage and cruelty in destroying them: and, as if this had been a small thing, they proceeded to gratify their inhuman avarice, by seizing all the women and children, to sell them, or to keep them for slaves. But, if the Lord had so severely punished their offending brethren of Judah, could the men of Israel expect to escape his fierce indignation? Were there no sins among them to provoke his displeasure? Rather, were they not already abundantly sufficient, without augmenting them by this iniquitous and cruel treatment of the women and children, who had never injured them? Or, could they hope for the mercy of God, if they neither shewed mercy nor justice to their brethren? They were therefore required to set the captives at liberty; because they themselves were exposed to the fierce wrath of God. This was the Lord's message to the conquerors by his prophet; and it naturally leads us to consider some questions concerning slavery.—Let it then be remembered, that there do not at present subsist any such distinctions between nations, as God for wise reasons, was pleased, for a time, to establish between Israel and the Gentiles; but every man is now our neighbor, and in one sense our brother; our fellow man, if not our fellow Christian.—They indeed attempt too much who argue, that slavery in all cases is contrary to scriptural principles; and this has given its advocates some advantage in the controversy. But no man, well acquainted with the word of God, needs fear to maintain, that the modern slave-trade stands in diametrical opposition to both the law and the gospel; as well as to the true interests of mankind. Who can possibly hold his unoffending brother in bondage, for his own gain, without violating the rule of doing to others, as he would that they should do unto him, and as he might fairly expect that they should do unto him? (Note, Matt. 7:12.) Suppose that an African should kidnap the son of an English merchant, carry him to Africa, and, pretending property in him, should sell him for a slave; and so he should be sold from one to another for life, and his children after him. Suppose that Africans gave such prices for Englishmen, as encouraged them to steal and sell one another, till it became a regular trade; would not free-born Britons execrate buyers, sellers, stealers, and all concerned in such a traffic? Those who have forfeited their lives by crimes against the state, have also forfeited their natural right to liberty; and might justly be sold for slaves, by public authority, declaring the crimes for which they were thus punished. Some other criminals, and some kind of fraudulent debtors, might be sold for a limited time, consistently with equity. Perhaps some prisoners taken in battle, in those wars, which are evidently undertaken by all concerned in them, from avarice and cruelty, might thus be punished, without transgressing the law of God; for the policy of it forms quite a distinct question. But to seize, enslave, and sell a fellow creature, who has, by no criminality known to us, or cognizable by us, merited so severe a treatment, must in all cases be contrary to the law of "loving our neighbor as ourselves." The poor Africans cannot be proved to be either criminals, debtors, or prisoners taken in rapacious or revengeful wars, waged by them against those who enslave them: on the contrary, they appear generally to be persons, who have been kidnapped from their relatives, or bought of them; or taken prisoners in wars, excited on purpose to supply that infamous market. If any of them be criminals, the European merchants know it not: they have no authority from either God or man to be their executioners; and their descendants certainly are not criminals. Were it indeed true, (which is far from being the case,) that if not bought by the Europeans, they would be slain by the conqueror; we need only answer, 'You must not "do evil, that good may 'come." If you have no other way of rescuing 'them, you had better leave them to fight their 'own battles, and treat their captives as they 'please, without interfering: and you certainly 'would do so, if avarice were no more concerned 'in the business than humanity is.' It is true, that the scripture throughout speaks of slavery as actually existing: but the judicial law was very distinct from the moral law, as has before been shewn. (Note, Ex. 21:1—6.) Like other municipal laws, it aimed to prevent those evils, which originated from abuses and human passions, and which could not be terminated except by constant miracle; as in the case of divorces. The apostles and evangelists were preachers, not legislators; they were not empowered to subvert

12 Then certain of [b] the heads of the children of Ephraim, Azariah the son of Johanan, Berechiah the son of Meshillemoth, and Jehizkiah the son of Shallum, and Amasa the son of Hadlai, [c] stood up against them that came from the war,

13 And said unto them, Ye shall not bring in the captives hither: for whereas we have offended against the LORD already, ye intend to [d] add more to our sins and to our trespass: for our trespass is great, and there is fierce wrath against Israel.

the foundations of civil government throughout the world; and they found slavery universally and inseparably interwoven with them. Every one must therefore perceive what confusion, what reproach, and what additional enmity to Christianity, must have been occasioned by such an attempt. They indeed laid down the principles, which, when reduced to practice, will infallibly annihilate slavery: and, taking things as they then stood in civil society, they taught all Christians, how to accommodate themselves to their stations, consistently with their profession, even if they were slaves, and slaves in a heathen family.—The question is, therefore, to be decided not by facts, but by The Moral law of God, and the tendency of the GOSPEL. The practice could not then be regularly opposed, without creating convulsions in society; nor can it ever be successfully rectified by preachers: it is the work of enlightened, humane, and pious legislators.—Individual believers under both dispensations possessed slaves: they took matters as they were; and treated their slaves with such equity and humanity, as rendered it a kindness to them, to take them out of ungodly families. And a pious West-Indian, who laments the enormities which he cannot but witness, arising from this unnatural trade, and who sincerely wishes and prays for its entire abolition, may, in the mean time, deem it better, quietly to set his neighbors an example of treating slaves with brotherly lenity and kindness, conducive to their real happiness, than indiscriminately to liberate them: when perhaps it might occasion fatal effects upon the minds of the other planters and their slaves; if this were done by an individual, in opposition to all his neighbors, and without the interference of legal authority. When strangers are brought so far from home, and are not able to return, a truly pious and humane man may render the yoke tolerable to them. But, who had a right by compulsion to bring his unoffending brethren so far from their native land? And what proportion do pious and humane persons, in most communities, bear to those of an opposite character? A succession of very wise and good kings, if that could be ensured, might render even absolute monarchy a blessing. But, while mankind are what they are, men of reflection, and lovers of their brethren, will never be friends to despotism in kingdoms, or in families: and absolute monarchs and the holders of slaves, (except of such as are condemned by an equitable sentence, to that condition, as the punishment of their crimes,) will ever be justly exposed to the determined opposition of mankind, even when they do not merit detestation by any direct abuse of power.

V. 12—15. It is remarkable that Pekah is not mentioned in this transaction concerning the prisoners: but probably he was at the head of the army, when the prophet addressed them. (6)—The courage of these princes, who ventured thus determinedly to oppose the whole army, insolent with victory and enriched with booty, was admirable and highly commendable, and their arguments were cogent, and coincided with the message of the prophet. The apostacy, idolatry, and recent cruelty of Israel rendered their trespass very great; and if they reduced the captives to slavery, it would add still more to their sins, and hasten the execution of the fierce wrath of God upon them.—The compliance of the army, in leaving both the captives, and the spoil, to the disposal of the princes, was very wonderful and perhaps unparalleled in history; and the humane treatment, and the carrying back of the captives to their brethren, deserves all possible applause.—The prophet's remonstrance had for the time its full effect: but, alas! both princes and people still cleaved to their idols, and went on in their other sins. (Marg. Ref.) 'What might 'not these great men have done, to bring them to 'repent of their idolatry, if they had been truly 'religious and exerted their authority?' Bp. Patrick. The narrative also shews, that even Israel, amidst all their idolatries and iniquities, had not forgotten, and were not disposed to question, the divine authority of the law of Moses.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

Those, who succeed eminently wise and pious men in the same important station, seldom enter into their views or imitate their conduct, in "doing that which is right in the sight of the LORD:" nay, frequently they seem ambitious of being as opposite to them as possible; especially when they run into wickedness, after having received a pious education. (Note, 2 Kings 21:3.)—When sinners "like not to retain God in their knowledge," he gives them up to the lusts of their own hearts, to perpetrate every thing horrible and unnatural: and when such monsters of iniquity are advanced to thrones, it is evident, that the Lord intends by them to punish a guilty land, by involving their subjects in the consequences of their crimes and follies. They, therefore, who are groaning under the oppression of cruel tyrants, or suffering from the effects of their infatuated counsels, are called on to humble themselves before God for their own sins, to submit to his justice, and to seek deliverance from his mercy. On the other hand, if we are governed with equity and clemency, and live in peace and prosperity, through the prudent and successful administration of our rulers; we should bless God for his mercies, and shew forth our gratitude in our daily conduct: and it is the constant duty of us all to pray for those who are, or shall be, placed over us, that they may be the instruments of God's goodness and mercy to us, and not of his wrath.—Tempters and examples of iniquity are often employed as scourges; and the sentence, which God righteously denounces, man may unrighteously execute.—It is a lamentable reflection, that so many thousands of lives, are sacrificed to the mad passions of potent individuals, who themselves escape: but they that thus are cut off, are sinners, and are punished for having forsaken or offended God.—The combined effects of several depraved passions is very dreadful: when revenge is satiated, avarice or ambition may take the reins; and if power be not wanting, the widow, the orphan, the stranger, and the helpless, will be oppressed, crushed, and enslaved without redress; while the oppressor will rejoice in growing rich by these detestable measures. But the Lord beholds and disapproves; and, in one way or another, he will plead and avenge the cause of the oppressed.

V. 9—27.

It is happy, when the authority of God's word, or the expostulations of his ministers, deter men from persisting in mercenary cruelties; or excite legislators and princes to put a stop to their iniquity. If the oppressed have provoked God, to deliver them up into the hand of their oppressors; should not these remember, that "there are with them also sins against the LORD?" Even rigorous justice towards an offending brother, is a grievous offence, in one that only lives and hopes through the mercy of God. (Notes and P. O. Matt. 18: 23—35.) But for those, who have deserved the heavy wrath of God for their own sins, to injure and cruelly entreat their unoffending brethren, must "add exceedingly to the fierce wrath of the LORD that is upon them." If "he shall have judgment without mercy, who has shewed no mercy;" what will be his doom, who has been guilty of the most flagrant injustice to the inoffensive stranger, merely because he had it in his power to oppress him! Surely, in such a case, while the ministers of the gospel warn, exhort, and beseech the oppressors to deliver the captives up, whom they have taken of their brethren: the legislators and rulers of every state should peremptorily refuse admission into their dominions, to those bond-slaves, whom men have so unjustly reduced under their subjection. For we have offended against the Lord already, and this connivance must add still more to our sin and to our trespass, till fierce wrath come upon the nation. Nay, if the poor captives, who have been violently torn from their native country, and who have no power to return to their beloved relatives, could, when dismissed and kindly treated, be carried back again to them, it would be a conduct becoming the disciples of Christ; it might tend to render the name of CHRISTIAN respectable in those distant regions, where the cruelty, treachery, and avarice of those who bear it, have rendered it odious; and thus at length prepare the way for the propagation of the gospel among these poor benighted heathens. And, instead of injuring the interests of the community, or of any individuals; (except the most atrocious of the oppressors, who have no right to be considered;) we may venture, upon general scriptural principles, to foretel, that above all other measures, it would tend the most effectually to the lengthening of our tranquillity and prosperity. (Note, Dan. 4:27.)—But if those, who commiserate their oppressed fellow-creatures, long to see their grievous servitude terminated, they must unite in prayer for the divine blessing upon the exertions of those, who honorably stand forth in this benevolent cause. For, except the Lord touch the hearts of such as are to decide upon it, every exertion will be in vain.—When sinners are left to their own hearts' lusts, they grow more and more callous, and desperate in wickedness; and "trespass yet more and more" in their distress, as if in defiance of God; seeking redress in their miseries, from those sins whence all their sufferings spring, and which will terminate in their ruin and in that of all who adhere to them. For when God casts down, none can raise up; and all helpers will increase distress, instead of affording deliverance.—The progress of wickedness and misery is often rapid: and it is awful to reflect upon the case of one, who has "trespassed more and more," and added one impiety to another, and done all in his power to lead others into the same destructive courses; being at once "driven away in his wickedness," into the eternal world. (Note, Prov. 14:32.) Yet, even this apparent severity of God, against the ringleaders in iniquity, proves mercy to thousands, when righteous and useful persons are raised up in their stead.

CHAP. XXIX. V. 1, 2. Notes, 2 Kings 18:1—3.

V. 3—5. 'This demonstrates his great piety 'and zeal for God, that he began so soon to reform 'religion. ... The surest way to establish himself, 'he thought, was to establish true religion; though 'he run a great hazard in attempting the abolish-'ing idolatry, which had been confirmed by some 'years' prescription.' Bp. Patrick. It seems that the public worship at the temple was entirely suppressed and prohibited, during the latter years of king Ahaz. (7. 28:24. 2 Kings 16:17,18.) The only reason advanced for a contrary opinion, is this: it is not said, that the sacred fire on the altar of burnt-offering was extinguished, or that it was re-kindled by fire from heaven, as at the dedication of the temple. If, however, the service was not totally put a stop to, the people in general were shut out from attending.—Hezekiah must have witnessed this impiety of his father, with deep regret and indignation: but immediately upon his succession to the throne, he threw open the doors of the temple, and proceeded to re-establish the worship there, as in the days of David. Yet the priests and Levites delayed to do their duty, till excited to it by the king. Perhaps Urijah was still the high priest; (Note, 2 Kings 16:10—16.) the chief priests were infected with idolatry, and disaffected to the service of God; and their inferiors, even if well disposed, might be held back by the authority of the leading men, till required and authorized by Hezekiah.—Sanctify, &c. Ref.* g, h.)—Much rubbish, dirt, and rust, would be contracted, through disuse and neglect, in the temple, the courts, and the sacred vessels: but the idolatry with which they had been polluted, and the altar, made after the model of that which Ahaz saw at Damascus, formed by far the worst filthiness, from which they needed to be cleansed.

V. 6, 7. (Marg. Ref.) Our fathers, &c. (6) When the honor of God was concerned, Hezekiah did not hesitate to criminate those who had gone before. He did not indeed directly mention Ahaz, his father, because that was not needful; and the neglect and base compliances of the priests and Levites, had greatly contributed to the wickedness of the king and his nobles. V. 8, 9. Hezekiah attempted to prevail with the priests and Levites to attend t their duty, by argument and affectionate exhor tation, and not by compulsion. This condescending address assured them of his readiness to support and protect them, as a father would do his obedient children. He warned them not to be deceived; for God would certainly call them to a strict account, if they neglected the work to which he had chosen them: or he exhorted them not to be remiss, when extraordinary exertions were become absolutely necessary.

V. 12—19. All these leaders in the work were Levites of the different families of that tribe: (Marg. Ref. u—c:) not the chief in rank, but the most eminent for zeal and diligence. The high priest is not mentioned. Some of the other priests concurred, and cleansed the inside of the sanctuary, whither the Levites might not enter.—When the ark was to be removed, and on other necessary occasions, the priests might enter the holy of holies, though not at other times. (Note, Num. 4:5.)—Ahaz died about the close of the year; and Hezekiah had given timely orders to the priests and Levites, for them to begin this work with the new year. It is surprising that Ahaz did not cut in pieces all the tables of shew-bread, and the other golden and silver furniture of the temple; but merely cast them aside.

According to the commandment of the king, &c. (15) When Ahaz commanded Urijah contrary to the law of God, both he, and the priest who obeyed his impious command, acted most wickedly. (Note, 2 Kings 16:10—16.) But the priests and Levites acted right, in proportion as they obeyed "the commandment of the king by the words of the Lord." Hezekiah properly improved his talent, without intermeddling out of his province; and they as properly yielded obedience.—Why should not the case be the same, under the Christian dispensation? Was Hezekiah's interposition any part of the ritual law of Moses, which Christianity has superseded? (Note, 30:12.)

V 20. Perhaps Hezekiah arose earlier on that day than common, that he might set the people an example of earnestness in the service of God. He would not lose a day, nor an hour, after the temple was ready, before he opened the solemn worship of God, by sin-offerings and other sacrifices. (Notes, Ps. 119:57—63. Matt. 6:33,34.)

V. 21—24. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Lev. 1:5—9.) —One bullock was appointed for a sin-offering for the high priest, and one for the whole congregation; but on this extraordinary occasion, when so many and great enormities had been committed, multiplied atoning sacrifices were offered. (Notes, Lev. 4:13—21. Num. 15:22—29.) The ceremony, of the king and the congregation laying their hands upon the head of the goats, expressed their confession of guilt, and the substitution of the guiltless animal to suffer in their stead; which prefigured him "who bare our sins in his own body on the tree." (Notes, Lev. 1:4. 16:20—22.) It is not, however, here stated, that the prescribed rules, respecting the sin-offerings, for the priest, the ruler, or the nation, as to carrying the blood into the most holy place, and burning the bodies without the camp, was observed. Perhaps this was not done: and in that case, these sin-offerings must be considered, as in some respects different from those prescribed in that part of the law. (Notes, Lev. 4:4—7,11,12. 6:30. Heb. 13:9—14, vv. 11,12.)—The word here rendered he-goats, (21) is not used in scripture till after the captivity, and learned men think that this is one proof that Ezra compiled these books.—The burnt-offering and the sin-offerings were presented, not only in behalf of the kingdom of Judah, but for all Israel, even the ten tribes, which were at this time governed by Hoshea. Hezekiah seems in this to have had respect to the plan which he afterwards proposed, and which is recorded in the ensuing chapter; namely, of uniting the whole instruments of David, and [d] the priests with the trumpets.

27 And Hezekiah commanded to offer the burnt-offering upon the altar. And [*] when the burnt-offering began, [e] the song of the LORD began also with the trumpets, and with [†] the instruments ordained by David king of Israel.

28 And [f] all the congregation worshipped, and [‡] the singers sang, and the trumpeters sounded: and all this continued until the burnt-offering was finished.

29 And when they had made an end of offering, the king and all that were [§] present with him, [g] bowed themselves, and worshipped.

30 Moreover, Hezekiah the king and the princes commanded the Levites to sing praise unto the LORD, [h] with the words of David, and of Asaph the seer. And [i] they sang praises with gladness, and they bowed their heads and worshipped.

31 Then Hezekiah answered and said, Now ye have [‖] consecrated yourselves unto the LORD, come near, and bring [k] sacrifices and [l] thank-offerings into the house of the LORD. And the congregation brought in sacrifices, and thank-offerings; and [m] as many as were of a free heart, burnt-offerings.

32 And [n] the number of the burnt-offerings, which the congregation brought, was threescore and ten bullocks, an hundred rams, and two hundred lambs: all these were for a burnt-offering to the LORD.

33 And the [o] consecrated things were six hundred oxen, and three thousand sheep.

34 But [p] the priests were too few, so that they could not flay all the burnt-offerings: wherefore [q] their brethren the Levites [¶] did help them, till the work was ended, and until the other priests had sanctified themselves: [r] for the Levites were more [s] upright in heart to sanctify themselves than the priests.

35 And also [t] the burnt-offerings were in abundance, with [u] the fat of the peace-offerings, and [x] the drink-offerings for every burnt-offering. [y] So the service of the house of the LORD was set in order.

36 And [z] Hezekiah rejoiced, and all the people, that [a] God had prepared the people: for [b] the thing was done suddenly.

nation of Israel in celebrating the passover, and in the worship of God.

V. 25—30. The temple-psalmody was regulated with the concurrence of these other prophets, as well as by the appointment of David. (Notes, 23:11—21, v. 13. 1 Chr. 9:22. 15:16. 16:4—6. 25:1—8. Ezra 3:8—11. Ps. 33:2,3. 81:1—5. 95:1—6. 150:)

The priests with the trumpets. (26) The blowing of trumpets by the priests, on various occasions, and in particular over the sacrifices, was a part of the ritual law of Moses, and is here exactly distinguished from the psalmody instituted by David and the prophets. V. 31, 32. As the burnt sacrifices were wholly consumed on the altar, the offering of them evinced greater zeal and liberality, than the oblation of peace-offerings, a great part of which was eaten by the offerer and his friends. (Notes, Lev. 1: 3:)—Comparing the sacrifices offered on this occasion, with those of Solomon when the temple was dedicated; (7:5—10. Note, 1 Kings 8:63—65.) though here it is said the burnt-offerings were in abundance; we may form some idea, how greatly the riches and prosperity of the kingdom of Judah were diminished; or, how greatly the general spirit of piety had declined. (30:24.)

V. 33. It is probable, that the consecrated things denote the peace-offerings and thank-offerings.

V. 34. It does not appear that any idolatrous priests were punished: but perhaps some were disgraced and excluded from attendance; while many neglected to sanctify themselves, being averse to the sacred service. It was therefore deemed more proper, that upright and duly sanctified Levites should flay the sacrifices, than unclean or profane priests. This is considered by many as irregular, but it is no where prohibited. Indeed, before the Levites were given to the sons of Aaron, it is probable, that they who brought the sacrifice both slaughtered and flayed it; (Note, Lev. 1:5—9.) afterwards these services seem to have formed a part of the ministry assigned to the Levites, at the will of the priests: but at length it became customary for the priests to perform them. The Levites might not in any case sprinkle the blood, burn the fat and flesh, or approach the altar.—'The Levites were men 'of greater integrity than the priests: at least 'there were more men of zeal found among them, 'that readily offered themselves to the service of 'God. See 30:17.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 35. Marg. Ref.

V. 36. The great and sudden change produced in the conduct of the people; and the alacrity with which they concurred in measures, to which much opposition had been expected, evidenced that "God had prepared" them: and Hezekiah and all the people rejoiced in it, as a token that he would prosper them in endeavoring a more complete reformation. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 30:12.) God 'had given this good mind 'to them, to join so forwardly in this reformation.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—19.

The removal of a single individual of very bad character, from any public situation, and the succession of a wise and pious person in his stead, may be productive of most important and extensive good effects: for authority, influence, and example, give such energy to the attempts of princes and nobles, that the consequences of their conduct are beyond all calculation. What an honor is it to be employed, in diffusing piety and felicity through whole kingdoms! But how dreadful will be the condemnation of those, who spread guilt and misery in so extensive a manner!—Whether a godly man inherit a kingdom, or an estate; whether he change his station in society or his place of abode, or be removed to a new situation in the church; his first actions will be of considerable importance, and often leave an abiding impression: and regulations may frequently be then made without difficulty, before different habits and expectations have been formed; which would afterward become almost impracticable.—Even in that nation, in which God had appointed that apostates and idolaters should be punished with death, the most effectual revivals of true religion were produced by example, exhortation, and encouragement: and if it were in the hearts of kings and rulers, thus to join themselves in covenant with the Lord, and zealously to stir up all orders of people to do their duty, by earnest persuasions and affectionate expostulations, without using violence, or imposing on men's consciences; many would be excited willingly to concur in their pious designs, and to "come according to the commandment of the king, by the words of the LORD." (Notes, 10,11. 30:12.) Happy and honorable will they be, who shall thus become "nursing fathers" to the church, not by bribes and preferments, but by countenancing those, who zealously labor to promote acknowledged truth and practical godliness, even though not all exactly in the same way.

V. 20—36.

The nominal ministers of religion have, in all ages, been lamentably backward, in laboring and venturing to promote the cause of God: and the higher their dignities, and the greater their emoluments, the more evident, alas, frequently, has been their aversion to the work of the ministry. Too generally indeed the infidelity and impiety of all orders in the community are justly chargeable upon the vices, the supineness, or the insufficiency of the stated ministers. Instead of exhorting all others to do their duty, no exhortations have been found effectual, to induce them to attend to their own: nay, they have often been found disposed to over-awe and brow-beat their inferior brethren, who were willing to "labor in the word and doctrine;" and to supply their lack of service, that immortal souls might not perish for want of instruction. But if the honor of a parent is not to be regarded, where the glory of God is concerned, such clergymen, however dignified, must not expect to be treated with respect, when the very existence of true religion is at stake: and the reputation of the clerical function must be supported by the holy lives, superior knowledge in divine things, and unwearied labors of the clergy; or else it will sink into neglect and contempt. The true minister of Christ, however, should take heed first to himself and then to his ministry. His own conscience, heart, and life must first be purified, by repentance, and faith in the divine Savior; and then he may hope to prosper in endeavoring to convert others also, and to promote the pure and spiritual worship of God.—In all reformation, personal or public, we must first be convinced, in what particulars we have done wrong, and then consider how we may do better. Neglect of God and omission of duty lead to more direct impiety and iniquity; and our own transgressions prepare us to become tempters and seducers of others. Thus religion is run down, and the wrath of the Lord comes on apostate professors of the gospel, and on apostate nations. In returning to him, therefore, we must renounce our sins and begin to practise neglected duties, to use the means of grace, and to watch against the wickedness of the heart. We, indeed, have no occasion for multiplied sacrifices; as the one atonement of Christ is sufficient for all who rely on it: but we need repeated confessions of guilt, constant humiliation before God, and application to the Savior's blood, for forgiveness and acceptance: we need to maintain daily communion with our reconciled Father through Christ, and to receive continual communications from him: and we should present our spiritual sacrifices of praise and thanksgiving, and devote our time, talents, and substance, yea, our bodies and souls, with a free heart, as sacrifices acceptable to the Father through the Redeemer's name. To these things we are encouraged by the joyful sound of his gospel: when we abound in these sacred exercises, according to the commandment of the holy prophets and apostles of Christ, we shall be enabled, though in ourselves most miserable sinners, to "rejoice in the Lord," and to glory in his salvation. Those ministers, who are most diligent in preparing for their work, and in performing it, will eventually be most employed and honored, even though inferior in external distinctions; and slothful disqualification will never excuse any man's negligence before God. But he alone can prepare the heart of man for vital godliness: when much real good is effected in a little time, the glory must be ascribed to him; and all who love him, or the souls of men, will rejoice. If we would have such blessings, we must make it our constant prayer to him, thus to "prepare our hearts" and those of others; for when he works, great things may suddenly be effected. The Lord grant, that none called ministers may be negligent; but that they may all act as chosen by him, to stand before him, and to serve him; and zealously do his will, that his wrath may be turned from them, and from others on every side, by his blessing upon their labors, and in answer to their fervent prayers and supplications!

salem, [d] to keep the passover unto the LORD God of Israel.

2 For [e] the king had taken counsel, and his princes, and all the congregation in Jerusalem, to keep the passover [f] in the second month.

3 For they could not keep it [g] at that time, [h] because the priests had not sanctified themselves sufficiently, neither had the people gathered themselves together to Jerusalem.

4 And the thing * pleased the king and all the congregation.

6 So [n] the posts went with the letters from † the king and his princes, throughout all Israel and Judah, and according to the commandment of the king, saying, Ye children of Israel, [o] turn again unto the LORD God of Abraham, Isaac, and Israel, and he will return to the remnant of you, that are [p] escaped out of the hand of the kings of Assyria.

7 And be not ye [q] like your fathers, and like your brethren, which trespassed against the LORD God of their fathers, who therefore gave them up to desolation, [r] as ye see.

8 Now ‡ be ye not stiff-necked as your fathers were, but § yield yourselves unto the LORD, and [s] enter into his sanctuary, [t] which he hath sanctified for ever: and [u] serve the LORD your God, that [x] the fierceness of his wrath may turn away from you.

9 For [y] if ye turn again unto the LORD, your brethren and your children shall find compassion before them that lead them captive, [z] so that they shall come again into this land: for [a] the LORD your God is gracious and merciful, and [b] will not [c] turn away his face from you, if ye return unto him.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXX. V. 1. The other tribes of Israel were as much bound to obey the law of Moses, as Judah and Benjamin were; but Hezekiah had no authority over them. Yet the circumstances, in which they were placed, encouraged him to address them by letters, with an amicable and pious invitation; which implied, that they might attend at the temple with perfect safety, though they were not his subjects. (Notes, 1 Kings 12:26—29. 2 Kings 17:2. 18:9—12.)—Ephraim and Manasseh, as principal tribes, seem to be put for the whole kingdom of Israel.

V. 2—4. Hezekiah and his counsellors justly concluded, that the regulation of the fourteenth day of the second month, which had been made for individuals, who were hindered from eating the passover at the appointed season, might, in their present circumstances, be extended to the whole congregation. (Notes, Num. 9:6—14.)—A sufficient number of the priests had not been duly sanctified, to prepare the temple for that ordinance at the stated time, or to officiate in it; the people, long disused from attendance, were not generally assembled; those who were present seemed well disposed to celebrate that solemn and significant ordinance; and it might have an abiding good effect, if the favorable opportunity were seized. (Notes, 35:1—19. Ex. 12:3—27.) For these reasons, it was determined to summon the people to attend, and to keep the passover in the second month.

V. 5. As it was written.] It is probable, that the passover and the other solemn feasts, were sometimes totally omitted for many years together; at other times very carelessly attended, and by very few persons, compared with what the law required: and the ten tribes had never been accustomed to repair to Jerusalem, since the division of the kingdom. (Notes, 26,27. 11:13—17. 1 Kings 12:26—32.)

V. 6—9. Hoshea was king of Israel at this time, and it does not appear, that he attempted to hinder his subjects from resorting to Jerusalem to worship, if they chose it. (Note, 2 Kings 17:2.)—In the preceding reign, Israel had made a most dreadful slaughter of the men of Judah: yet Hezekiah considered the Israelites as brethren, and greatly desired to bring them back, by kind treatment, to the religion of their fathers; therefore he sent his proclamation, or letters, into the parts of the land belonging to the ten tribes, as well as throughout his own dominions.—The word rendered "posts" signifies runners: for men were then, and still are in many places, trained, and kept on purpose, to convey despatches speedily by running.—Even then, the Israelites were but a remnant, which had escaped from the ravages of Pul and Tiglath-pilezer: and far heavier judgments awaited them for their apostacy and idolatry; which could not be averted, except by turning again to the God of their fathers. Hezekiah, however, most affectionately and plainly, cautioned them, not to copy the crimes of their fathers and brethren, whose miseries they had witnessed: he warned them not to be "stiff necked," or obstinate in rebellion: (Note, Deut. 10:16.) and he exhorted them to "yield themselves unto the LORD;" that is, to yield the victory to him, to submit to his authority, to lay down their rebellious arms, to implore mercy, and to become his servants. (Note, Rom. 6:12,13.) He entreated them also to "enter into his sanctuary, which he had sanctified for ever:" that is, to renounce their idolatries and self-invented worship, and to resort with their sacrifices to the temple at Jerusalem,

10 So [d] the posts passed from city to city through the country of Ephraim and Manasseh, even unto Zebulun: but [e] they laughed them to scorn, and mocked them.

11 Nevertheless, [f] divers of Asher, and Manasseh, and of Zebulun, [g] humbled themselves, and came to Jerusalem.

12 Also in Judah [h] the hand of God was to give them one heart to do [i] the commandment of the king and of the princes, [j] by the word of the LORD.

[Practical Observations.]

13 ¶ And there assembled at Jerusalem much people to keep the feast of unleavened bread in [k] the second month, a very great congregation.

14 And they arose, and took away the [l] altars that were in Jerusalem, and all the altars for incense took they away, and cast them into [m] the brook Kidron.

15 Then they killed the passover on the fourteenth day of the second month: and the priests and the Levites [n] were ashamed, [o] and sanctified themselves, and brought in the burnt-offerings into the house of the LORD.

16 And [p] they stood in their [*] place [q] after their manner, according to the law of [r] Moses, the man of God: [s] the priests sprinkled the blood, which they received of the hand of the Levites.

17 For there were many in the congregation that were not sanctified: therefore [t] the Levites had the charge of [u] the killing of the passovers, for every one that was not clean, to sanctify them unto the LORD.

18 For a multitude of the people, even [x] many of Ephraim and Manasseh, Issachar and Zebulun, [y] had not cleansed themselves, yet did they eat [z] the passover otherwise than it was written. But Hezekiah [a] prayed for them, saying, [b] The good LORD pardon every one and there to keep the solemn feasts.—The temple was not only the centre of God's worship, and the pledge of his gracious presence with his people; but likewise the type of those spiritual blessings which are from everlasting to everlasting upon all true believers.—Hezekiah also encouraged those whom he addressed, to hope, from the abundant mercy and grace of God to the penitent, that if thus they turned to him, the fierceness of his wrath would be turned away from them; and even to expect the restoration of their brethren and children, who were already in captivity: for God, having all hearts in his hand, could and would make the enemies of those who pleased him to be at peace with them, and to shew them compassion. In this, he evidently referred to the promises contained in the books of Moses. (Marg. Ref. y—b.)—It is observable, that these letters carefully avoided all mention of the claim of David's family to dominion over all Israel; and of former injuries and quarrels, or whatever could give any shadow of offence, either to the prince or his subjects, except in the immediate concerns of religion.

V. 10, 11. The nation of Israel was almost ripe for destruction; and it is by no means wonderful, that most of them insulted and mocked the messengers, who carried these faithful expostulations and invitations: indeed we may rather wonder, that they met with no harsher treatment. Some, however, out of the several tribes were prevailed on; and, humbling themselves for former sins, resorted to Jerusalem; so that, Hezekiah's pious design was not ineffectual, though not so successful as he had wished it to be.

V. 12. The language of this verse is entitled to special attention. "The commandment of the king and his princes, by the word of the LORD," met with ready and general obedience from the men of Judah, because "the hand of God was to give them one heart to do it." If the rulers had commanded any thing contrary to the word of the LORD, or beyond it, in affairs of religion; it would have been a misapplication of their authority: but, as they required nothing but what God had expressly enjoined, they duly improved their talent; and the people, by the grace of God, knew and performed their duty.—It does not appear, to me at least, that Christianity has at all altered the duty either of rulers or subjects in this respect. (Notes, 29:10,11,12—19, v. 15.) 'There was a mar-'vellous unanimity in Judah, who were so obe-'dient to the motions of the divine grace, (without 'which so great a charge could not have been 'made,) as generally to comply with the king's 'proclamation, made with the consent of the prin-'ces. They looked upon it as a divine command, 'which was brought to them by that authority: 'and it appeared so to be, by the mighty power of 'God, which wrought their hearts to a cheerful 'obedience.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 13. The emphatical language here used fully proves, that the concourse of people to celebrate this passover, was exceedingly great, compared with all other instances with which the writer was acquainted. (Note, 35:18,19.)

V. 14. The people assembled at Jerusalem some days before the passover; and they employed the intermediate time, in clearing the city of altars for idolatry, and from other abominations. This was an excellent preparation for the solemn ordinance, which they were about to celebrate. (Notes, 2 Kings 23:4—23.)

V. 15. The zeal and earnestness of the king, the princes, and the people in general, made the priests and Levites ashamed of their supineness, and stirred them up to prepare themselves, and attend on their work: 'they blushed to see the

V. 16—20. (Marg. Ref.) Either the Levites, or the offerers, might receive the blood of the victims; but the priests alone might sprinkle it.—It is evident from this passage, that, in ordinary cases, the persons who brought the paschal lambs slew them; or this exception would not have been stated: and it is at least probable, that the case was at first the same with other sacrifices. (Notes, 29:34. Lev. 1:5—9.)—But many of the ten tribes, having come at a short warning, and being destitute of instruction, were ceremonially unclean, and therefore not regularly prepared to eat the passover. (Notes, Num. 9:6—14.) Yet it would have greatly discouraged them, had they been excluded from that sacred ordinance, to which they had been invited: they appeared sincere and earnest in returning to the Lord, and there was a prospect of important usefulness. They were therefore allowed to eat the passover, when the Levites had killed it for them, notwithstanding their ceremonial disqualification: and Hezekiah, sensible that there was danger in this deviation, earnestly prayed to the good and merciful LORD, "to pardon every one that prepared his heart to seek ... the LORD, ... though not cleansed according to the purification of the sanctuary." (Marg. Ref. a—d.) To this prayer the Lord granted a favorable answer, "and healed the people." Perhaps he had visited them with some sickness for their irregular attendance, which he then graciously healed. (Note, 1 Cor. 11:29—34.) Or, he gave peace to their consciences, and healed their souls.

V. 21, 22. The sacrifices, psalmody, and worship of the people, were accompanied by the reading and expounding of the law: and some of the Levites were employed to instruct the people, in the good, the profitable, and pleasant knowledge of the Lord: (Note, 1 Chr. 28:9.) and the king peculiarly noticed and encouraged them in this useful work, which was very much wanted. (Notes, 15:1—7, v. 3. 17:7—9. Deut. 31:10—13. Ezra 7:6—10. Neh. 8:1—9,18. 9:1—3. 13:1—3.) This would excite others to apply themselves to the study of the law, that they too might be qualified for this service.—By "making confession," may be meant, either confessing their sins, or acknowledging the unmerited goodness of the Lord, or both combined.

V. 23—25. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 29:31,32.) This passover must have been not long before the time of harvest: but the hearts of the people were so enlarged with holy affections, that they were neither weary of the sacred service, nor in haste to return to their secular business. (Notes, Ex. 23:14—18. Lev. 23:10—21. Deut. 16:9.) 'They did not observe other seven days of 'unleavened bread, but offered sacrifices with 'praises and thanksgivings, and feasting, seven 'days.' Bp. Patrick.—The people in general, and those who came out of the kingdom of Israel, would be unprepared for the expense attending these sacrifices: and therefore both Hezekiah and his princes liberally gave cattle for sacrifices; in which no doubt they acted properly, and should be imitated according to the nature of the Christian dispensation, by princes and nobles, liberally supplying what is wanting to support the worship of God, and to make glad the hearts of their poorer brethren. (Notes, Ez. 45:16,17.) The example had also a salutary influence on the priests, who sanctified themselves, to take their part in the service.—Probably, "the strangers that came out of the land of Israel," as distinguished from "the congregation of Israel," were not Israelites by birth, but circumcised proselytes.

V. 26. The observance of this passover, and the solemnities that attended it, were attended with great joyfulness of heart, and crowned with a peculiar blessing: many of the priests and people were brought to a serious sense of religion, and an important revival was introduced among them; even superior to any, which had taken place since the days of Solomon: and in no instance had seven additional days been added to the time assigned to any festival, since the dedi arose, and blessed the people: and their voice was heard, and [u] their prayer came up to *his holy dwelling-place, even unto heaven.

cation of the temple by him. (Notes, 1 Kings 8: 63—66.)—As this occurred in the first year of Hezekiah's reign, and he reigned twenty-nine years, it must be supposed that he witnessed the effects of so good a beginning, to the end of his life. It was done suddenly, but, by the grace of God, it was done effectually.—Doubtless, the passovers and other solemn feasts were kept up, and attended to, during this reign, though not in so remarkable a manner as this first passover.

V. 27. This seems to have closed the solemnity, in a most suitable and impressive manner; and the fervent prayer of the priests was heard in heaven, and graciously accepted. (Notes, Num. 6:23—27.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

Favorable opportunities of fixing good impressions ought by no means to be neglected: and it is better that circumstantial irregularities should be admitted, than that divine ordinances should not be observed, or substantial usefulness prevented.—When duties have been long omitted, the time ought to be more carefully redeemed, that no further delays may be occasioned: former negligence, though it cannot be excused, may be forgiven; but persevering ungodliness will infallibly end in destruction.—We ought to embrace every proper opportunity of addressing men upon their eternal concerns, and of engaging as many as possible in the service of God: and we may employ arguments and persuasions with those, over whom we claim no authority. Injuries or enmities, however many or great, should not render us indifferent about the salvation of any man: no expense or labor ought to be regarded in our endeavors to do good: nor should we be discouraged by the prospect of the neglect, contempt, or even rage, of the very persons, whose happiness we are seeking. Numbers may and will "laugh us to scorn:" but several will be humbled and benefited; and perhaps where success was least expected, where impiety and profligacy were most notorious, and among those who appeared ripe for destruction. Such attempts should be made in plainness, meekness, and affection; all reproaches and upbraidings, and every thing assuming, or needlessly offensive, should be avoided; important and undeniable truths and duties should chiefly be insisted upon; and the conscience and passions, especially hope and fear, should be vigorously addressed. The consequences of impenitent rebellion against God should be solemnly stated, and contrasted with the happy effects of returning to him by humble, penitent faith; and the whole enforced, by arguments deduced from fact and experience. Addresses to this effect are peculiarly seasonable, while men are suffering for their crimes; and still deeper miseries present themselves to their view, from which they have no prospect of deliverance, but by the merciful interposition of God. And when, among their acquaintance and relatives, the prosperity of eminently pious persons can be compared with the misery of those who are notoriously profligate; the argument thence deduced, for repentance and returning to God, will have peculiar energy: for even the irreligious must see the absurdity of copying the wicked examples of fathers or brethren, who have been evidently ruined by their vices. But the rich mercy of God forms the grand argument, by which to enforce repentance on the sinner's conscience. "There is forgiveness with him," and "plenteous redemption" in the Savior's blood; and we are under a dispensation of mercy. Nothing but stiff-necked, obstinate, impenitent wickedness can ruin us. The chief of sinners, "who yield themselves to the LORD," shall certainly be saved. Let them therefore trust in his mercy, attend upon his ordinances, and join themselves to his people, that they may serve him; and then the fierceness of his wrath will turn away from them; but not otherwise. To this "we should exhort one another daily, lest any of us be hardened, through the deceitfulness of sin:" to this we should invite and persuade all others without exception, as far as we are able; for "him that cometh" to the Savior, "he will in no wise cast out:" but "will grant" unto all who believe in him, "that being delivered from the hand of their enemies, they may serve him without fear, in righteousness and true holiness, before him, all the days of their life;" and the covenant made with them will prove for the good of their children and brethren also.—Oh, that messengers were sent forth to carry these invitations to every city and village, through our land, and every land! It is true, the Lord alone can render them effectual; but he works by the word of his ministers, and also by the commandment of kings and princes, when it accords with his word.—Faith comes by hearing; and true religion has uniformly flourished, in proportion to the measure in which faithful, scriptural, preaching has abounded. In general, persons of wealth or authority might be instrumental in promoting this faithful preaching of the word of God, if they had the inclination, and were willing to bear the expense of it: nor can superior rank enjoy a higher privilege. All who are employed in such a work, should do it with their might; and neither be discouraged nor exasperated by opposition or reproach; and they will find at length that "their labor was not in vain in the Lord."

V. 13—20.

When we are humbled for our transgressions, and declare war against all our idols, expecting and seeking forgiveness and salvation only through the atonement of Christ, we become welcome communicants at the Lord's table. The unhumbled and impenitent indeed, the man who lives in known sin, and he who comes 'trusting in his own 'righteousness,' instead of the 'manifold and great 'mercies of God,' may presume to commemorate the death of Christ; but he is an intruder, who comes to the marriage-feast, without the wedding-garment. (Note, Matt. 22:11—14.) Yet when the sinner has indeed begun to prepare his heart to seek the Lord; though his views be feeble, obscure, and in many things erroneous, and his approach be not exactly regular; he must not be discouraged, despised, or treated with harshness. Our blessed Advocate, who "breaketh not the bruised reed," will intercede for him; we too ought to pray for and encourage him; and "the good LORD will pardon" every one who bears this character. No trembling believer, therefore, who desires to trust in the Redeemer, and to shew his gratitude by obeying his plain command, needs to be alarmed, lest he should fail in that exactness, which he supposes is required in this ordinance: for the good LORD lays no snares in the way of humble, upright inquirers.—Previous preparation is indeed profitable; but the true believer is habitually ready, and ought not to retire for want of actual preparation. Yet every defect is sin, and needs forgiveness; and should be matter of hu-

The people destroy the idols, and their temples and altars, through the cities of Judah and in Ephraim and Manasseh, 1. miliation, though not of discouragement. (P. O. 1 Cor. 11:23—34.)—Man's authority cannot disannul or alter divinely instituted externals in the worship of God: yet these may be idolized; and the Lord will, on some occasions, approve the conduct of those, who prefer the spirit to the letter of an instituted observance, where both cannot possibly be attained; and who seize an opportunity of glorifying him, in seeking the conversion and salvation of souls, by postponing or relaxing in the exact observance of an external regulation.

V. 21—27.

Many allowances ought indeed to be made for those, who are newly brought forth out of very ignorant places, to attend on the ordinances of God; yet they must not be left in their mistakes. His ministers must diligently "teach them the good knowledge of the LORD," of his perfections, mysteries, ordinances, and precepts, that they may proceed with increasing understanding and alacrity. Those, who labor in this important work, should be encouraged and counselled by their superiors, and by all capable of doing it; for it is a very arduous work, and often brings a man into many perplexities and discouragements.—When those who have been hitherto most careless, wicked, and profane, deeply humble themselves before God and return to him by true faith, they may in due time expect great gladness in his ordinances. Their confessions of sin will be made pleasant by the hope of forgiveness, and by that peace and joy which are the sweet fruits of the sanctifying Spirit. They, who taste this happiness in the worship of God, will not speedily grow weary of it, but will be glad to prolong the delightful employment, and must be, as it were, torn away to return to their secular occupations.—When the ignorant, the mean, and the profligate, as well as those of superior stations, become earnest in God's service, Pharisees will either be exasperated or ashamed: and it is happy for themselves and for others, when they are at length brought to true repentance, and fall in with, and help forward, the work of God in their several places. And if numbers of ministers, that have been ungodly and mercenary, become obedient to the faith, we may be sure, that God is powerfully at work, and has much more to do. (Note, Acts 6:7.)—True godliness will be attended with proportionable joy; and numbers met together, to whom the Lord has given one heart to delight in his ordinances, will share and augment each other's rejoicing. But such seasons on earth are transient: trials and conflicts await us after our choicest consolations; yet, these are highly beneficial to us.—The solemn and affectionate benedictions and prayers of the Lord's ministers, by which the people are dismissed from sacred ordinances, are not to be slighted: though spoken on earth, they are heard in heaven, the holy dwelling place of our reconciled God. The intercession of our great High Priest, however, is chiefly to be valued: he never fails to plead for every believer, and he never pleads in vain. A few more interruptions of our joy, by conflicts and temptations, (whilst in him we still have peace,) and we shall be with him to behold his glory: then our worship, our love, and our rejoicing, will be uninterrupted, unalloyed, and eternal.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXI. V. 1. (Note, 30:14.) Either this destruction of the appendages of idolatry in Israel was confined to those cities and villages, which had come under the dominion of the kings of Judah; or else, Hoshea not objecting to it, the people, in their zeal for the honor of the God of Israel, went into different parts of his kingdom, for this purpose; while the idolaters were intimidated from making any opposition. (Notes, 34:3—7. 2 Kings 23:15—20.) When this was done, they returned home: and it is probable that some of the Israelites, who had been at the feast, retired into the land of Judah, during the ravages of Shalmaneser, and so escaped the general ruin. 'They 'would not return home, till they had done all they 'could to establish and promote true religion. Of 'so great import it is (as Pellicanus here observes) 'to have a good king, and a well instructed peo-'ple.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 2. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 23:11—21, v. 18,19.) David, as a prophet, had made many of these arrangements, to which as king he required the obedience of the priests and Levites. Jehoiada both as high priest, and as acting in the name o. the young king, restored them: but Hezekiah, who was not a prophet or priest, took the lead and gave the directions on this occasion; yet he added nothing to what had before been instituted, and altered nothing in it. "The king's commandment was according to the word of the Lord." (Notes, 30:12. 1 Chr. 23:2—6,24—28.)

were stationed, resembled the tents in which soldiers are regularly encamped.

V. 3, 4. The public sacrifices were generally purchased by contributions from the people: but Hezekiah at this time, chose to be at the expense of them out of his own stated revenue; (Note, Ez. 45:17.) that the people might be the more ready to obey his commandment, in bringing their tithes and first-fruits, according to the law of God, for the maintenance of the priests and Levites. This was intended to encourage the priests and Levites to apply themselves entirely to studying, teaching, and fulfilling the law of the Lord; being assured that their families would not be left destitute. (Notes, 30:21,22. Neh. 12:44—47. 13: 10—13. 1 Cor. 9:7—18.)

V. 5—7. The several productions here mentioned were laid in different heaps, in some convenient place, but not properly guarded or taken care of. (Marg. Ref.) It is probable, that some of the first-fruits, tithes, and offerings, were generally sold, and the money reposited in one common stock. 'They began to offer first-fruits in 'the third month when their harvest began, and 'finished their tithing in the seventh month, when 'their harvest was ended, Ex. 23:16.' Bp. Patrick.—Hezekiah commanded nothing more than what was enjoined by the law: but he used his authority to enforce on the people the requirements of the law, and "the hand of God was to give them one heart to perform the commandment of the king and of the princes, by the word of the LORD." (Note, 30:12.)

V. 8. Hezekiah and his princes commended the liberality of the people; they also prayed for them, and gave thanks to the Lord, who had given them the power and inclination to bring such abundance. (Notes, 1 Chr. 29:10—19. 2 Cor. 8: 1—5,16—24. 9:8—15.) 'They gave thanks to God, 'who had given them such plenty of good things, 'and had likewise given them a heart to offer it 'plentifully.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 9, 10. The king and the princes supposed, from the abundance which they beheld, that the priests, who had the superintendence of the business, had preserved the whole; and they inquired, wherefore they had not distributed the oblations of the people. But it was answered, that the Lord had blessed the people with such an abundant increase, that all this was left, after the priests and Levites had been sufficiently provided for! (Notes, Hag. 1:5—11. 2:15—19. Mal. 3:7—12.) The disinterestedness of the priests was highly commendable; for they might easily have enriched themselves, without being suspected: and the whole transaction enlarges our idea of the blessing which had attended the preceding solemnity: for before this, the priests seem to have been generally very careless and ungodly. (Notes, Mal. 1:9—14.)—It is probable, that Azariah was the chief priest, under the high priest, and nearly related to him. (13. 1 Chr. 6:13,14.)

V. 11—14. (Neh. 10:37—39. 12:44. 13:5,9. Notes, 1 Kings 6:5,6. Neh. 13:10—14.) Hezekiah commanded 'to build new store-houses; .. 'because there was not room enough wherein to

V. 15—19. The priests and Levites, as they attended in their courses, had a certain portion allotted to them, according to their office and charge. The sons of the priests, who attended with them, as it seems, from three years of age, to learn the work of the sanctuary, previously to the time of their officiating, had a provision made for them. A list was taken of the wives, and of the other children, of the priests and Levites, and a proportionable allowance was assigned them: as also to those, who were excluded or excused from attendance; and for all of those who were absent from the temple, employed as magistrates and teachers in their several districts. Thus none appropriated an exorbitant proportion, and none wanted a suitable provision: "for in their set office, they sanctified themselves in holiness;" they separated themselves from other employments, and devoted themselves to serve God in their proper office, in a holy and believing expectation that he would provide for them; (for so the words seem to mean:) nor were they disappointed. And this regular provision kept them from the temptation of entangling themselves in worldly cares and employments, to the neglect of their ministry. 'This seems to be a reason, why such care was 'taken of their wives and children; because their 'husbands were wholly given up to the service of 'God, and could not follow any other employment, 'whereby to provide for the maintenance of their 'families.' Bp. Patrick. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Neh. 13:10—13. 2 Tim. 2:3—7.)

V. 20, 21. The general conduct of Hezekiah was good in itself; he acted with equity and impartiality towards all his subjects in these regulations, and strict attention to the laws and institutions previously established. His heart also was upright in the sight of God: and in all that he attempted, to establish the worship of the Lord, and to obey and enforce the observance of his law, seeking his favor and glory, he was earnest and hearty, and single in his aim and dependence; and he was prospered accordingly. What a commendation was this as given by God himself! What a happy instrument was this pious king of good to his people! and what an encouraging and worthy example is this for princes, magistrates, ministers, and Christians to imitate!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

The finishing of one duty should form an introduction to the beginning of another; and he, who "delighteth greatly in God's commandments," will not complain of this as a weariness.—Public ordinances, and divine consolations, should stir up men to cleanse their hearts, houses, or shops, and every thing in which they are concerned, from the filthiness of sin, and the idolatry of covetousness: and to exhort and excite others to do the same, by every method, consistent with relative duties and the peace of society.—The subsequent improvement of solemn ordinances, is of the greatest importance to personal, family, and public religion. It is then our business to meditate on, and reduce to practice, what we have learned; to express our pious affections in every kind of good work; and to take care that the vigor of them do not subside, through unwatchfulness, neglect of prayer, or worldly indulgences. Inattention to these duties renders the private conversation and behavior of most, who profess the gospel, inconsistent with their public profession, and apparently religious affections: their growth in grace is thus prevented, and religion does not appear so venerable by far as it otherwise would do.—Examples should concur with exhortations or injunctions, whether men act as magistrates or ministers: and this will give them greater effect, in many cases, than menaces, coercive measures, or severe rebukes. Those, who would have others expend their wealth in useful works, ought to take the lead: nay, the easiest method of enforcing the laws, and prevailing with others to pay their dues, is often found to be by receding from personal claims, and joining liberality with justice, in the magistrate's own conduct.—The proper use of superior riches is, to do superior good with them: and if this were generally understood and believed, the most blessed effects would be produced.—Every exercise of human authority in the church of God must be regulated and bounded by his law, and must enforce obedience to it, and not make additions to it, or alterations in it.—While ministers ought to attend upon their proper work, in their several places; they should be encouraged in it, and not constrained or tempted to neglect it, by the want of a suitable maintenance for their families; or made uneasy and distressed in attending on it: nor should any excuse be afforded to those, who by choice leave the word of God for secular engagements.—A man is never impoverished by prudent liberality, in works of piety and charity: indeed, this is the way to ensure the blessing of God on his substance and his labors. (Marg. Ref.) And when the portion, which is due to the ministers of religion, and to the poor, is conscientiously rendered to them, it shall be recompensed as if it were a free will offering.

V. 11—21.

A proper use of authority, joined with a good example, and convincing arguments, will induce many to do their duty in those things, in which they before were entirely negligent: but, whatever means are used, when men abound in good works, we should bless the Lord for it; and due commendation should not be withheld from them.—Disinterestedness, impartiality, and frugality, are requisite in those who have the management of public charities, or other public funds: for when proper care is taken of the sums already contributed, and they are evidently expended for the sole purpose intended, encouragement is given to further contributions.—It would tend greatly to the welfare of the church, if ministers were provided for, with some degree of equality, proportioned to their diligence, their families, and their necessary expenses: and it is a shameful abuse, that funds anciently appropriated for the maintenance of the clergy, are in a great measure applied to aggrandize those who do very little for them; whilst the real laborers in the vineyard are scarcely kept from starving, and leave no provision for their families when taken from them. Legislators should rectify such abuses. But the faithful servant of God needs not be discouraged: let him study to live, and to preach, according to the word of truth, and "give himself wholly" to his work; and let him do it in faith, and the Lord will not suffer him to want; yea, he will provide for his children after him. But all pious men are not able to go on comfortably in this manner; and it is a grievous thing, that their spirits should be depressed, and their hands weakened, in their work, on this account: but it is still far worse, when they are tempted to leave their proper employment, to earn a morsel of bread for their wives and children. May the Lord raise up in every nation zealous men, who in such matters, and in all others, will "work that which is good, and right, and truth, before the LORD;" and who will do their utmost, "with all their hearts in the service of the house of God, and in the law, and in the commandments," to seek the honor of the Lord!—Whether we have few or many talents, may we thus improve them, and encourage others to do the same: we shall then assuredly be prospered in some measure; and shall obtain that "honor which cometh from God," being graciously addressed by him with, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXII. V. 1. Most of the transactions, recorded in the preceding chapters, took place in the first year of Hezekiah's reign: and from that time he proceeded to establish and complete his reformation, without any very memorable occurrences, till his fourteenth year, in which Sennacherib's first invasion occurred. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 2 Kings 18:13—16.)

V. 3, 4. (Marg. Ref.) The brook, here mentioned, is supposed to have been Kidron, or Cedron, called also "the upper water-course of Gihon." (30) Through subterraneous or concealed channels, Hezekiah brought the waters of this rivulet into the city, to supply certain pools there formed for the use of the inhabitants. Or, by some means, he turned or concealed the course of it, in order that the Assyrians might be distressed for water, if they undertook the siege of Jerusalem.—"The kings of Assyria" had, during several successions, been formidable enemies to Israel and Judah: and this measure was intended, not only for a present defence against Sennacherib, but also as a security against future invasions of him or his successors. (Note, Is. 22:8—14.)

syria, nor for all the multitude that is with him: [q] for there be more with us than with him:

8 With him is [r] an arm of flesh; but [s] with us is the LORD our God, to help us, and [t] to fight our battles. And the people * rested themselves upon the words of Hezekiah king of Judah.

9 ¶ After this did [u] Sennacherib king of Assyria send his servants to Jerusalem, B. C. 710. (but he himself laid siege against [x] Lachish, and all his † power with him,) unto Hezekiah king of Judah, and unto all Judah that were at Jerusalem, saying,

10 [y] Thus saith Sennacherib king of Assyria, Whereon do ye trust, that ye abide in the ‡ siege in Jerusalem?

11 Doth not Hezekiah persuade you [z] to give over yourselves to die by famine and by thirst, saying, [a] The LORD our God shall deliver us out of the hand of the king of Assyria?

12 [b] Hath not the same Hezekiah taken away his high places and his altars, and commanded Judah and Jerusalem, saying, [c] Ye shall worship before [d] one altar, and burn incense upon it?

13 Know ye not what [e] I and my fathers have done unto all the people of other lands? [f] were the gods of the nations of those lands any ways able to deliver their lands out of mine hand?

14 Who was there [g] among all the gods of those nations, that my fathers utterly destroyed, that could deliver his people out of mine hand, that [h] your God should be able to deliver you out of mine hand?

15 Now therefore let not Hezekiah [i] deceive you, nor [k] persuade you on this manner, neither yet believe him: for no god of any nation or kingdom was able to deliver his people out of mine hand, and out of the hand of my fathers: how [l] much less shall your God deliver you out of mine hand?

16 And his servants spake [m] yet more against the LORD God, and [n] against his servant Hezekiah.

17 He [o] wrote also letters [p] to rail on the LORD God of Israel, and to speak against him, saying, [q] As the gods of the nations of other lands have not delivered their people out of mine hand, so shall not the God of Hezekiah deliver his people out of mine hand.

18 Then [r] they cried with a loud voice in the Jews' speech unto the people of Jerusalem that were on the wall, [s] to affright them, and to trouble them; that they might take the city.

19 And they [t] spake against [u] the God of Jerusalem, as against the gods of the people of the earth, which were [x] the work of the hands of man.

20 And for this cause [y] Hezekiah the king, and [z] the prophet Isaiah the son of Amoz, [a] prayed and cried to heaven.

21 And [b] the LORD sent an [c] angel, which [d] cut off all the mighty men of valor, and [e] the leaders and captains, in the camp of the king of Assyria: so he returned [f] with shame of face to his own land. And when [g] he was come into the house of his god, they that came forth of his own bowels, § slew him there with the sword.

22 Thus [h] the LORD saved Hezekiah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem from the hand of Sennacherib the king of As-

V. 5—8. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 20:14—19. 2 Kings 6:15—17. 1 John 4:4—6.) These measures seem to have been adopted, and this most encouraging exhortation given, at the approach of Sennacherib's first invasion: and the people in general had a strong confidence, that the Lord would deliver them according to the word of Hezekiah. 'They relied on what he said, as if it had been 'spoken to them by God himself.' Bp. Patrick. Some, however, seem to have confided rather in their fortifications.—Yet Hezekiah himself was afterwards induced to submit to Sennacherib, and pay him tribute; on this he departed, but not long after he renewed his attempts. (Note, 2 Kings 18:13—16.)

(15) This haughty conqueror supposed that JEHOVAH was even inferior to the gods of the nations! Probably he grounded this notion on the inferiority of Judah, in extent and population, to many of the kingdoms which he had subdued; especially as he was master of almost the whole

23 And many brought [k] gifts unto the LORD to Jerusalem, [l] and * presents to Hezekiah king of Judah: so that [m] he was magnified in the sight of all nations from thenceforth.

[Practical Observations.]

B. C. 713. 24 ¶ In those days [n] Hezekiah was sick to the death, and prayed unto the LORD: and he spake unto him, and he † gave him a sign.

25 But Hezekiah [o] rendered not again, according to the benefit done unto him; for [p] his heart was lifted up: [q] therefore there was wrath upon him, and upon Judah and Jerusalem.

26 Notwithstanding [r] Hezekiah humbled himself for the ‡ pride of his heart, both he and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, so that the wrath of the LORD came not upon them [s] in the days of Hezekiah.

27 ¶ And Hezekiah had [t] exceeding much riches and honor: and he made B. C. 700. himself [u] treasuries for silver, and for gold, and for precious stones, and for spices, and for shields, and for all manner of § pleasant jewels;

28 [x] Storehouses also for the increase of corn, and wine, and oil; and [y] stalls for all manner of beasts, and [z] cotes for flocks.

29 Moreover he provided him cities, and [a] possessions of flocks and herds in abundance: for [b] God had given him substance very much.

30 This same Hezekiah also [c] stopped the upper water-course [B. C. 712.] of [d] Gihon, and brought it straight down to the west side of the city of David. [e] And Hezekiah prospered in all his works.

31 Howbeit [f] in the business of the || ambassadors of the princes of Babylon, who sent unto him to inquire of [g] the wonder that was done in the land, God [h] left him [i] to try him, [k] that he might know all that was in his heart.

32 Now the rest of the acts of Hezekiah, and his ¶ goodness, behold they are written [l] in the vision of Isaiah the prophet, the son of Amoz, and [m] in the book of the kings of Judah and Israel.

33 And Hezekiah [n] slept with his fathers, and they buried him in the [B. C. 693.]  chiefest of the sepulchres of the sons of David: and all Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem [o] did him honor at his death. [p] And Manasseh his son reigned in his stead.

(Notes, 2 Kings 20: Is. 38: 39:) These events are supposed, by many learned men, to have been previous to Sennacherib's first invasion, as evidently occurring in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah's reign. (Note, 2 Kings 18:13. 20:1.)—The princes and the people of Judah, as well as the king, had been very ungrateful for their many mercies: and when "Hezekiah was humbled for the pride of his heart," and had received Isaiah's alarming message, it is probable he made open confession of his offence, and called upon the people to join with him in solemn humiliation and prayer on that account. It may, however, be doubted, whether the ambassadors from the king of Babylon came to Jerusalem before Sennacherib's last invasion of the land; as the treasures, which Hezekiah shewed them, seem to have been obtained by the result of that invasion, and the presents, which were afterwards brought to him. Manasseh reigns long, is very wicked, multiplies idolatries, corrupts the people, and rejects the admonitions of God, 1—10. The omniscient God before knew the whole; but, having by the trial made the case evident, he thus pointed it out to Hezekiah, and to all succeeding ages, for their humiliation, warning, and instruction. (Notes, Deut. 8:2,3.) For it hence appears undeniable, that the best of men, if left to themselves, are prone to pride and ostentation, to idolize themselves and their fellow creatures, to withdraw their dependence from God, to rob him of his glory, and to be ungrateful for his mercies. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—23.

Satan and his emissaries are most eager to give us disturbance, when we are most usefully employed: but God restrains them, till he sees it needful to correct our misconduct, or to try our faith and constancy, and then they are permitted, under certain restrictions, to assault us.—It is very lawful and proper to employ prudent precautions and means of defence; and to be united and vigorous in every advisable measure, when there is a prospect of danger or difficulty: but it is seldom that men attend to these things, without confiding in them. We should therefore encourage ourselves and each other, to trust wholly in the Lord: and if he is for us, there will be more with us than with our foes; should all the men on earth, and all the legions of fallen angels, combine and actually approach to assault us. What need then have we to fear the strongest arm of flesh, when we have the "LORD our God to help us, and to fight our battles!" These are words, that may safely be rested upon, by all who "repent and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance." Yet such a confidence will excite the contempt and reviling of idolaters, infidels, and other proud, ungodly men: those who venture to do their duty, in defiance of the persecuting rage of some powerful king, professing to rely on the Lord of hosts, will be deemed obstinate and infatuated: and in various difficulties, it will be inquired, whether "they will be persuaded to give themselves over to die by famine and thirst." The more undaunted any one is, while trusting the Lord in the path of duty, the more will some impious wretches rail, blaspheme, menace, boast, and triumph; especially when grown insolent by success, and intoxicated with absolute authority. But let the oppressed and insulted believer pray earnestly to the Lord, that he may not be driven from his confidence. In due time it will appear, that "none ever hardened himself against God and prospered;" and that none were ever confounded who put their trust in him. For, as the power and justice of God are displayed in the destruction of his enemies; so, his rich and free mercy are glorified in the salvation of his people.

V. 24—33.

Alas! how seldom do we in any good degree render to the Lord according to his benefits! None, who know themselves, and watch over their own hearts, will venture to cast a stone at Hezekiah; but they will all, one by one, depart convicted in their consciences of similar guilt, and crying out, "God be merciful to me a sinner!"—If we be not left to expose our foolish and wicked pride before the world, the Lord sees and abhors the risings of it in our hearts, and might justly pour out his wrath upon us: yet, if humbled for this pride of our heart, he will forgive us and continue to bless us. But we ought to watch and pray always, that we may not "enter into temptation," and that God would not leave us to ourselves: we ought to repress every vain-glorious thought, and to welcome even afflictions and severe rebukes, and painful conflicts and temptations, when they keep us from being "exalted above measure." Blessed be God, death will soon end the believer's conflict; then every sin will be abolished, and he may safely be trusted with the most glorious exaltation and uninterrupted felicity; and will no more, to all eternity, be tempted to intercept the least mite of that revenue of praise, which belongs to the God of his salvation.—While we are here, we ought to honor those to whom honor is due, though they be far from perfect: and we may well respect the memories, and should imitate the example, of those who have been pious and useful in their generation: for,

of heaven, [l] in the two courts of the house of the LORD.

6 And he [m] caused his children to pass through the fire in the valley of the son of Hinnom: also [n] he observed times, and used enchantments, and used witchcraft, and [o] dealt with a familiar spirit, and with wizards: he wrought much evil in the sight of the LORD, to provoke him to anger.

7 And he set a carved image, the idol which he had made, [p] in the house of God, of which [q] God had said to David, and to Solomon his son, In this house, and in Jerusalem, [r] which I have chosen before all the tribes of Israel, will I put my name for ever:

8 Neither [s] will I any more remove the foot of Israel from out of the land, which I have appointed for your fathers; [t] so that they will take heed [u] to do all that I have commanded them, according to the whole law and the statutes and the ordinances [x] by the hand of Moses.

9 So Manasseh [y] made Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem to err, and [z] to do worse than [a] the heathen, whom the LORD had destroyed before the children of Israel.

10 And [b] the LORD spake to Manasseh, and to his people: but they would not hearken. [Practical Observations.] a short time may perhaps awfully convince survivors, that the loss of them was far greater, than at first could be at all supposed.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIII. V. 1—5. (Notes, 2 Kings 21:1—5.) Perhaps Hezekiah named his son Manasseh from the circumstance, that many of the tribe of Manasseh, had come at his invitation, to attend the passover. (Note, 30:11.)

V. 6—8. Manasseh 'seems to have studied to 'find out what God had forbidden in his law, that 'he might practise it.' Bp. Patrick. (Notes, 2 Kings 21:6—8.)—A carved image, the idol, &c. (7) "A graven image of the grove," 2 Kings 21:7.

V. 9, 10. (Notes, 2 Kings 21:9,10.) 'A most 'prodigious change from the height of piety in his 'father's time, into the sink of impiety in this! ... 'Victorinus Strigelius, ... professor of theology at 'Heidelberg, left this remark in his lectures on 'this place, near an hundred and forty years ago:' (that is, soon after the establishment of the reformation in Germany:)—' 'Now we have the word ' 'of God abundantly in all wisdom, and pious ' 'princes patronise both those that preach, and ' 'those that learn the gospel. But this plenty of ' 'the word we now enjoy, (I tremble to speak it, ' 'but I must speak it, because it will come to ' 'pass,) shall be taken away: and that sad mourn-'ful time will come, when the public assemblies 'of the church shall be scattered, and a few pious 'souls shall meet with fear in a corner, to com-'municate among themselves the fragments of ' 'the heavenly doctrine, and give God thanks for ' 'these remainders.' Which we have seen ful-'filled in that country, and in France, and other 'places.' Bp. Patrick.—This apparent prophecy seems to have been merely a presage grounded on the vicissitudes of things, especially in respect of religion, and the tendency of prosperity to induce carnal security.

V. 11. There is not the least intimation, in the Second Book of Kings, either of Manasseh's captivity, or of his repentance: and it might have been concluded from the narrative there given, that he persevered in his career of impiety and iniquity, with impunity, till his death. Here, however, we find a most instructive view of his latter years; and this very man became as eminent an instance of the power, riches, and freeness of divine mercy and grace, as any recorded in the scripture.—When he and his people had long disregarded the admonitions of the prophets, and added persecutions, and multiplied murders, to their other crimes; (9,10. Notes, 2 Kings 21:16. 23:26,27.) "the LORD brought upon them the captains of the host of the king of Assyria." We are not informed what devastations these invaders made in Judah and Jerusalem: but Manasseh, being either vanquished or intimidated, attempted to conceal himself in a thicket; where, being discovered, he was taken prisoner, loaded with fetters, and sent to Babylon. God, in his providence, gave the Assyrians the power and opportunity of making this invasion, and he left them to follow their own ambition, or other worldly motives; and he also gave them success, in order to chastise Manasseh's enormous wickedness.—Many suppose, that Esar-haddon, having got possession of Babylon, and entirely changed the inhabitants of the kingdom of Israel, about the same time sent to invade Judah, and carried Manasseh captive to Babylon, in the twenty-second year of his reign. But the scripture does not mention the date of this event, nor the name of the Assyrian king: and from the scriptural description of Manasseh's reign, as exceedingly wicked, it seems highly improbable, that he lived above thirty years after his repentance and reformation, as upon this supposition he must have done. 'This was three and thirty 13 And prayed unto him: and [m] he was entreated of him, and heard his supplication, and [n] brought him again to Jerusalem into his kingdom. Then Manasseh [o] knew that the LORD he was God.

14 ¶ Now after this [p] he built a wall without the city of David, on the west side of [q] Gihon, in the valley, even to the entering in at [r] the fish-gate, and compassed about * Ophel, and raised it up a very great height, and [s] put captains of war in all the fenced cities of Judah.

15 And [t] he took away the strange gods, and the idol out of the house of the LORD, and all the altars that he had built in the mount of the house of the LORD, and in Jerusalem, and cast them out of the city.

16 And he [u] repaired the altar of the LORD, and sacrificed thereon [v] peace offerings, and [x] thank-offerings, and [y] commanded Judah to serve the LORD God of Israel.

17 Nevertheless [z] the people did sacrifice still in the high places, yet unto the LORD their God only.

18 ¶ Now [a] the rest of the acts of Manasseh, and [b] his prayer unto his God, and the words of [c] the seers that spake to him in the name of the LORD God of Israel, behold, they are written [d] in the book of the kings of Israel.

19 [e] His prayer also, and how God was entreated of him, and [f] all his sin, and his trespass, and the places wherein he built high places, and set up groves and graven images, [g] before he was humbled; behold, they are written among the sayings of [†] the seers.

V. 12, 13. When Manasseh was deprived of his authority and liberty, and secluded from his evil counsellors and companions, and from all his pleasures; in chains, and in a prison; without any other prospect, than of ending his days in that wretched situation; he had leisure to reflect on what had passed. He would then, no doubt, recollect the honor, prosperity, and great deliverances, with which his father had been favored; his own good education, with the instructions and warnings of the prophets; and his atrocious, multiplied, and daring crimes: and he would remember that his miseries had been foretold by his faithful monitors. Thus, by the special grace of God, his solitude and affliction brought him to view his own conduct and character in another light than he had done before; and he began to pray for mercy and deliverance, "humbling himself greatly before the God of his fathers." (Note, Luke 15:17—19.) He confessed his sins, condemned himself, and was covered with shame before God, abhorring his crimes, and loathing himself for them, as guilty of most aggravated ingratitude, impiety, and iniquity; yet still hoping to be pardoned, through the abundant mercy of the Lord, who had always, in the days of his ancestors, shewn himself ready to forgive repenting rebels. These humble supplications the Lord graciously accepted: and he inclined the king of Assyria to liberate his prisoner, and to reinstate him in his authority. "Then Manasseh knew that the LORD he was God," alone able to punish, or to deliver: he likewise became acquainted with him as a God of salvation; and learned to fear, trust, love, and obey him. (Note, 1 Chr. 28:9.)

V. 14. Marg. Ref.

V. 15—17. It is evident, that Manasseh, on his return from Babylon, entirely renounced all idolatry; and set himself to suppress it in his kingdom, to revive the worship of God at the temple, and by his example and authority to prevail with the people to attend on it. These were "fruits meet for repentance."—It has indeed been asserted, that his public reformation was very imperfect, and that he did not shew the zeal and vigor, which a true penitent ought to have done. It does not however, appear, from this short account, that he was remarkably deficient. He would have done better, if he had demolished the idols, instead of casting them out of the city. But he totally suppressed all open idolatry: and it might arise from other causes than Manasseh's want of zeal, that the high places were not removed. The inveterate habits of the people; the powerful opposition of that party, which had concurred in his former idolatries, and of the nation in general; and the weakness of his authority, through ill success, and the power of the Assyrian monarch; would occasion obstacles, which he might not be able to overcome. (Notes, 14:2—5. 17:6. 20:31—34, v. 33. 1 Kings 15:14.) But there is not the most remote intimation, that God did not accept his endeavors. Yet the opposition or hypocrisy of the people, who had readily concurred in his iniquities, but refused to imitate his repentance, prevented it from being a national blessing, as his crimes had formed and occasioned a load of national sin, "which the LORD would not pardon." (Notes, 2 Kings 23:26,27. Jer. 15:2—4.)

V. 18, 19. The repeated mention of Manasseh's prayer, "and how God was entreated of him," and of his being humbled, are well worthy of our notice. This humble, supplicating frame of mind forms, as it were, a crisis in the sinner's case; and from the moment that he is brought into it, he enters upon a new state, and commences a new life, however wicked he before has been. (Marg. Ref.) The prayer, contained in the Apocrypha, and ascribed to Manasseh, probably was composed long after: but no doubt he prayed continually and fervently, for all the blessings and mercies which so atrocious a sinner needed: and with particular confessions of his sins, and with all that unstudied copiousness, which a burdened conscience, a broken heart, trembling fears, waver-

V. 20. Note, 2 Kings 21:18.

V. 21—25. (Note, 2 Kings 21:20—24.) As soon as Manasseh was dead, Amon re-established all his father's idolatries; either bringing back those images which had been thrown aside, or forming others of the same kind. Perhaps he flattered himself, that he too should live many years; and should repent in his old age, if that were necessary, and so at last be saved, as his father was supposed to have been. But whatever warnings or convictions he had, he never "humbled himself" in true repentance; but "trespassed more and more." Or, "this Amon multiplied trespass." (Marg.) He was therefore soon cut off in his sins, and made an example of just severity; and placed as a beacon, to warn all men, not to draw perverse conclusions from the example of the Lord's patience and mercy to Manasseh, and thus encourage themselves in impenitent wickedness. (Notes, Dan. 5:18—24. P. O. 18—31. Luke 23:39—43.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

It would be extremely distressing to pious parents, magistrates, or ministers, if they could foresee the consequences of their removal, in the conduct of their children or people, and in the subversion of their most important regulations. Yet good instructions and examples may remain, like seed under the ground, for a long time unperceived, and yet at length spring up and bring forth much fruit. Without disquieting ourselves about futurity, we may therefore cheerfully commit our families, and our endeavors to do good, as well as our souls and bodies, into the hand of God, assured that our labors will not prove wholly ineffectual. (Ps. 90:17. Note, Ec. 9:1—3.)—The tendency of human nature to evil is so strong, that nothing but divine grace can give it a contrary bias: and when that power is in any degree suspended or withheld, men return to evil, as a stone falls downwards; and run, with rapid and accelerated motion, continually further and further into transgression. But the Lord notices both the number, the variety, and the aggravations of our offences: and mercies and opportunities ungratefully abused, the truth held in unrighteousness, the seduction or compulsion of others to sin, warnings slighted or despised, and mischief extensively committed, add exceedingly to the heinousness of men's offences. (Note, Luke 7:40—43.) Yet, "where sin hath abounded, grace hath often much more abounded:" (Note, Rom. 5:20,21.) and some of every description of sinners shall be brought to repentance and salvation, to prove that "with God nothing is impossible."

V. 11—25.

When the objects of the Lord's special love disregard the rebukes of his word, he will let them feel his chastening rod: and they may truly say, "Before I was afflicted, I went astray; but now have I kept thy word." Adversity, solitude, and sequestration from gay companions, and scenes of business, pleasure, and dissipation, connected with present sufferings and the prospect of death and eternity, cause many to reflect, who in prosperity were careless and presumptuous. The effects of a pious education, or of solid religious instructions, often shew themselves in affliction: the troubles themselves verify the warnings of pious relatives or teachers; and worse things arise before the mind, as the dreaded consequence of continuing in sin. Yet all this would not have an abiding effect, if afflictions were not a 'means 'of grace,' which God himself uses and blesses, as evidently, as he does those which he commands us to employ for ourselves and for each other. When men are left to themselves, "in their distress they trespass yet more against the LORD." But when he gives the blessing, the hardest, stoutest, and proudest heart softens, and becomes broken and contrite. His hand should therefore be noticed in all our afflictions; and our prayers presented that they may be sanctified, and converted into blessings to our souls.—Those, who have been most daring in rebellion against God, are sometimes the most cowardly, when assaulted by their fellow-creatures. "In the fear of the LORD, there is strong confidence:" but guilt appals the sinner, and his courage fails him in the hour of danger. There is, however, no possibility of fleeing or hiding ourselves from God: our only hope consists in humbling ourselves before him; and if our distresses and perils induce us to this, they will prove the most effectual means of promoting our felicity.—"The LORD is rich in mercy; with him there is plenteous redemption;" and he so delights in pardoning and saving transgressors, that he permits the vilest to come to his throne of grace. Wherever there is a sinner of whom it can truly be said, "Behold he prayeth," there will the Lord be found a God that heareth prayer. There is indeed immense difficulty in bringing the wicked thus to seek the Lord; but none in prevailing with him, to hear and forgive the returning penitent who calls upon him in truth. (Notes, Is. 55:6—9.) He often answers the mere cry of distress with temporal deliverances; while relapses into former crimes, and perseverance in them, prove that the supplicants were never truly humbled or penitent. But when a sinner in his affliction beseeches the Lord, and "humbles himself greatly before him;" when he condemns himself, ingenuously confesses his sins, and is covered with shame, and melted into godly sorrow; when he renounces all hope but in undeserved mercy, and every plea but in the Redeemer's name, and seeks forgiveness and salvation before all other things; he will assuredly find access and acceptance; and his future life will evince, that his repentance, faith, and love, have united in bringing him to hate and renounce all his sins, and to "walk henceforth in newness of life." If it were possible, he would undo his former wicked works, and lead into the ways of truth and peace all those, whom he had before seduced into the paths of sin and ruin: if his former life has been profane or immoral, his future conduct will appear a perfect contrast to it; and he will make an entirely contrary use of his wealth, abilities, or influence, after "he is humbled" and has begun to pray, to what he did before. (Comp. 3—5,9. with 15,16.) Sincere piety, and love to the truths, ordinances, and commandments of God, will be manifest in his subsequent conduct; and he will desire and aim at more than he can accomplish, both in serving God himself, and in attempting to prevail with others to do the same. The blood of Christ cleanses such penitents from all sin: their afflictions will either be sanctified and counterbalanced with comfort, or removed; in due time the Lord will extricate them from all the difficulties, in which their former sins had involved them; and he will be greatly glorified in their repentance, future conduct, and eternal salvation. Let sinners then be willing to know the worst of their case; for it is by no means desperate: let them consider all their pains and sorrows as so many calls to humble themselves before God, to call upon him, and to "acquaint themselves with him, that they may be at peace." And let not the hearts of those, who are thus seeking him, yield to discouragement; but let them humble themselves yet more and more, and "pray always and not faint."—Let pardoned sinners exert themselves to evidence their gratitude, and to glorify the God of their salvation; and let them walk humbly before him, and hope, pray for, and endeavor the conversion of their fellow sinners, not excepting the very worst: "for the things which are impossible with man, are possible with God."—But, on the other hand, let those, who take encouragement from the gospel presumptuously to expect salvation, without repentance and newness of life, read in Manasseh's deep humiliation, earnest prayers, and consequent newness of life, their own fatal and horrible delusion, who practically say, "Let us sin on, that grace may abound." Let those who trifle and procrastinate, because a merciful God has long borne with a few most notorious rebels, and at length granted them repentance and forgiveness of sins, meditate upon the example of Amon; and tremble, lest he should make them monuments of his righteous vengeance.—But indeed we have all sinned: let us all then inquire seriously, whether we have been and are deeply humbled, or not: and whether we are pouring out our prayers before the mercy-seat of a forgiving God, day by day, in this self-abased frame of mind: whether we have experienced a change in our judgment, disposition, aim, and general conduct; or whether we still continue unhumbled, impenitent, "trespassing still more and more," and imitating the wickedness, and only the wickedness, of those who are gone before us. The two characters are easily distinguished; and they comprise all mankind, and distinguish between those who are now in the broad road to destruction, and those who are in the narrow way of eternal life. May God help us to be honest to ourselves, and to form a just conclusion concerning our own characters, before death (which probably may come much sooner than we expect,) fixes us for ever in an unchangeable state!

CHAP. XXXIV. V. 1, 2. Note, 2 Kings 22:1,2.

V. 3—7. This passage seems a compendious account of Josiah's reformation, perhaps without

B. C. 624. 8 ¶ Now in [q] the eighteenth year of his reign, when he had purged the land, and the house, he [r] sent Shaphan the son of Azaliah, and [s] Maaseiah the governor of the city, and Joah the son of Joahaz the [t] recorder, to repair the house of the LORD his God.

9 And when they came to [u] Hilkiah the high priest, [x] they delivered the money that was brought into the house of God, which the Levites that kept the doors had gathered of the hand of [y] Manasseh and Ephraim, and of all the remnant of Israel, and of all Judah and Benjamin; and [z] they returned to Jerusalem.

10 And they put it [a] in the hand of the workmen that had the oversight of the house of the LORD, and they gave it to the workmen that wrought in the house of the LORD, to repair and mend the house:

11 Even to the artificers and builders gave they it, to buy hewn stone, and timber for couplings, and to * floor the houses which [b] the kings of Judah had destroyed.

12 And the men did the work [c] faithfully: and the overseers of them were Jahath and Obadiah, the Levites, of the sons of Merari; and Zechariah and Meshullam, of the sons of the Kohathites, to set it forward; and other of the Levites, [d] all that could skill of instruments of music.

14 ¶ And when they brought out the money that was brought into the house of the LORD, [i] Hilkiah the priest found a book of [k] the law of the LORD given by † Moses.

15 And Hilkiah answered and said to Shaphan the scribe, I have found the book of the law in the house of the LORD. And Hilkiah delivered the book to Shaphan.

19 And it came to pass, when the king had heard [o] the words of the law, [p] that he rent his clothes.

much respect to the order of time. He began seriously to attend to religious subjects, in the eighth year of his reign. 'He gave very early proofs of 'his pious inclinations; for when he was but six-'teen years old, and had newly taken on him the 'administration of affairs, he began to worship 'God publicly, and propounded David unto him-'self for his pattern. When he was twenty years 'old, he began to bring others to the true religion, 'by reforming abuses in the worship of God.' *Bp. (Notes, 2 Kings 22:3—7. 23:4—23. Jer. 1:1—3.) Yet the land was purged from its grosser abominations, before the repairing of the temple: but it is uncertain whether this extended to the land of Israel, or whether that be spoken of by anticipation: but it is plain that Josiah had authority over the country of the ten tribes, and the inhabitants of them.

V. 8—13. 'When he was twenty-six years old 'he proceeded further, having disposed the people 'to offer freely toward the reparation of the house of God.' *Bp. (9) These Levites seem to have gone through the land, soliciting contributions for repairing the temple, even from "the remnant of Israel;" and they returned to Jerusalem when they had completed that business.—The temple began to go to decay during the idolatries of Manasseh: and the wicked reign of Amon, and the long minority of Josiah, rendered it much in need of a thorough repair.

All that could skill, &c. (12) It seems, that the Levites, who attended by courses, in the intervals of their proper work, assisted by turns in superintending the workmen; nor were those excepted who were employed in psalmody: thus they became doubly useful, and saved the expense of other overseers. 22 And Hilkiah, and they that the king had appointed, went to Huldah [y] the prophetess, the wife of Shallum the son of Tikvath, the son of [z] Hasrah, keeper of the * wardrobe, (now she dwelt in Jerusalem in the † college;) and they spake to her to that effect.

23 And she answered them, Thus saith the LORD God of Israel, [a] Tell ye the man that sent you to me, 25 Because [d] they have forsaken me, and have burned incense unto other gods, that they might provoke me to anger with all the works of their hands; therefore [e] my wrath shall be poured out upon this place, and [f] shall not be quenched.

26 And [g] as for the king of Judah, who sent you to inquire of the LORD, so shall ye say unto him, Thus saith the LORD God of Israel, concerning the words which thou hast heard;

27 Because [h] thine heart was tender, and thou didst [i] humble thyself before God, when thou heardest his words against this place, and against the inhabitants thereof, and humbledst thyself before me, and [k] didst rend thy clothes, and weep before me; I have even heard thee also, saith the LORD.

28 Behold [l] I will gather thee to thy fathers, and thou shalt be gathered to thy grave [m] in peace, [n] neither shall thine eyes see all the evil that I will bring upon this place, and upon the inhabitants of the same. So they brought the king word again.

29 ¶ Then [o] the king sent, and [p] gathered together all the elders of Judah and Jerusalem.

30 And the king went up into the house of the LORD, and all the men of Judah, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and the priests, and the Levites, and all the people, ‡ great and small: and [q] he read in their ears all the words of [r] the book of the covenant that was found in the house of the LORD.

31 And the king stood [s] in his place, and [t] made a covenant before the LORD, to walk after the LORD, and to keep his commandments, and his testimonies, and his statutes, [u] with all his heart, and with all his soul, to perform the words of the covenant which are written in this book.

32 And [x] he caused all that were § present in Jerusalem and Benjamin to stand to it. And the inhabitants of Jerusalem [y] did according to the covenant of God, the God of their fathers.

33 And Josiah [z] took away all [a] the abominations out of all the countries that pertained to the children of Israel, and made all that were present in Israel to serve, even to serve the LORD their God. And [b] all his days they departed not || from following the LORD, the God of their fathers.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Several years of our lives must pass before we become capable of performing useful services: our earliest youth should therefore be dedicated to God, that we may not waste any of our remaining span. Happy and wise are they, who seek the Lord at a period of life, when others are pursuing sinful pleasures, contracting bad habits, forming ruinous connexions, and making work for bitter repentance; either gracious repentance in this world, or that which is attended with despair in the regions of misery. None can express the anguish which is prevented by early piety, and its happy consequences.—If we would be useful, we must first "take heed to ourselves;" and when we are established in faith and grace, we shall be fitted for instruments of good to others. In this important work we must expect many opposers, and but few cordial helpers: and the more we look into the world, the church, or our own hearts, by the light of God's word, the more evidently shall we see how very much reformation and renovation are every where needed. (P. O. Ez. 8:1—6.)—The suppression of gross abominations makes way for the pure administration of God's ordinances: and when the filthiness and idols are cleansed out of our hearts, the Lord will prepare his temple there, and graciously come and dwell in it.—Liberality, integrity, and diligence are commendable in every work, but especially in whatever relates to the worship and service of God, and all undertakings immediately connected with it.—When God enables us to act conscientiously, according to our present knowledge, he will in due time give us still further and clearer views of his truth. (Notes, Hos. 6:1—3. John 7: 14—17, v. 17.) The more we become acquainted with the Scripture, the more evidently shall we perceive our own guilt and danger: but if this discovery produces godly sorrow, contrition, humiliation, and further inquiries after the will of God, an answer of peace may be expected: while all the curses, which he has denounced, will fall upon the impenitent workers of iniquity.—Though we cannot prevent the ruin of sinners in general, or of collective bodies, we should endeavor by our examples, prayers, instructions, and the regular use of authority, in domestic, or in public life, to engage as many as we possibly can to return to God, and walk before him, by trusting his promises and obeying his commandments.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXV. V. 1—3. Note, 2 Kings 23: 21—23.—Taught, &c. (3) The Levites, by courses, served the priests at the sanctuary, as their primary employment: but when at home in their several cities, they were the stated teachers of the people. (Marg. Ref. e.—Notes, 17:7—9. 30: 21,22, v. 22.)—Put, &c.] It is probable, that the most holy place had gone to decay, through neglect; and that while it was cleansed and repaired, the high priest had committed the ark to the custody of some Levites of the family of Kohath who had been set apart and sanctified for that service: but when it was carried again into its place, they would be at liberty for other services, to the glory of God, and the benefit of his people.

V. 4. The regulations, formed by David, and established by Solomon, concerning the courses of the priests and Levites, were committed to writing, and preserved for them to refer to continually. (Notes, 8:12—15. 1 Chr. 23:—26:) Josiah, in like manner as Hezekiah had done, required the priests and Levites to attend to their several duties, and encouraged them in so doing: but he neither added, nor altered, nor retrenched any thing; he merely enforced what had been established in the law, and in the regulations made by David and the contemporary prophets. (10,16.) "The commandment of the king ... was by the word of the LORD." (Note, 31:12.)

V. 5. The meaning of this verse seems to be, that the Levites should be as exact, in ascertaining to what family, or subdivision of a family, every man belonged, as those of the other tribes were: that each might know and do his proper work, with as much certainty and accuracy, as the others knew what lands belonged to them by inheritance. Some, however, suppose, that only the arrangement of the Levites at this time is intended; and that they were directed to stand in regular order, according to their families, to receive the paschal lambs, which their brethren of the other tribes would bring, according to their families, one for each household. (6,10,11.)

V. 6. Notes, 30:16—20. Ex. 12:3—10, v. 6. Lev. 1:5—9.

7 And [q] Josiah *gave to the people, of the flock, lambs and kids, all for the passover-offerings, for all that were present, to the number of thirty thousand, and three thousand bullocks: these were of [r] the king's substance.

8 And [s] his princes † gave [t] willingly unto the people, to the priests, and to the Levites: [u] Hilkiah, and Zechariah, and Jehiel, [x] rulers of the house of God, gave unto the priests for the passover-offerings, two thousand and six hundred small cattle, and three hundred oxen.

9 Conaniah also, and Shemaiah and Nethaneel his brethren, and Hashabiah, and Jeiel, and Jozabad, chief of the Levites ‡ gave unto the Levites for passover-offerings five thousand small cattle, and five hundred oxen.

10 So the service was prepared, and [y] the priests stood in their place, and the Levites in their courses, according to the king's commandment.

11 And they killed the passover, and [z] the priests sprinkled the blood from their hands, and the Levites [a] flayed them.

12 And they removed the burnt-offerings, that they might give according to the divisions of the families of the people to offer unto the LORD, [b] as it is written in the book of Moses: and so did they with the oxen.

13 And they [c] roasted the passover with fire, according to the ordinance: but the other holy offerings [d] sod they in pots, and in caldrons, and in pans, and § divided them speedily among all the people.

14 And afterwards they made ready for themselves, and for the priests: [e] because the priests the sons of Aaron were busied in offering of burnt-offerings and the fat until night; therefore the Levites prepared for themselves, and for the priests the sons of Aaron.

15 And the singers the sons of Asaph were in their ‖ place, [f] according to the commandment of David, and Asaph, and Heman, and Jeduthun the king's seer; and [g] the porters waited at every gate; they might not depart from their service, for their brethren the Levites prepared for them.

16 So all the service of the LORD was prepared the same day, to keep the passover, and to offer burnt-offerings upon the altar of the LORD, according to the commandment of king Josiah.

17 And the children of Israel that were ¶ present kept the passover at that time, and [h] the feast of unleavened bread, seven days.

18 And [i] there was no passover like to that kept in Israel, from the days of Samuel the prophet; [k] neither did all the kings of Israel keep such a passover as Josiah kept, and the priests, and the Levites, and all Judah and Israel that were present, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

19 In the eighteenth year of the reign of Josiah was this passover kept.

That this therefore might not prevent their attendance on this solemn service, the king provided, at his own expense, an immense quantity of cattle suited to the solemnity; and after his example, the nobles, and the chief of the priests and Levites, liberally assisted their poorer brethren.—According to the calculation, that not fewer than ten, nor more than twenty persons, were to join for one lamb or kid, the numbers given on this occasion, would suffice for above four hundred thousand persons young and old: besides those given for peace-offerings and other sacrifices. V. 18, 19. Hezekiah's remarkable passover seems to have been celebrated with greater fervency of devotion; but this of Josiah was far more regular, and in more exact conformity to the law; it was attended by very great multitudes, and the liberality of the king in furnishing the paschal lambs was without example. (Notes, 30:2—5,16—27.)—Nothing is recorded on this subject, from the time that Israel obtained possession of the promised land: (Note, Josh. 5:10.) but even this passover, under Josiah, which exceeded all for several centuries, seems to have been very deficient as to genuine devotion.

20 ¶ After all this, when Josiah had prepared the *temple, [l] Necho king of Egypt came up to fight against [m] Carchemish by Euphrates: and Josiah went out against him.

V. 20—24. Josiah lived thirteen years after the remarkable passover before recorded, and zealously supported the worship of God to the end of his life. (Notes, 1—3, v. 3. 34:33. 2 Kings 23:26,27.) But the nation was all the while ripening for destruction; and was adjudged unworthy of so pious and excellent a prince.—Josiah's conduct at the close of his life has been treated with great severity by most commentators: and he has been charged with engaging in an unjust war, and disregarding the express command of God; which may in great measure be ascribed to the groundless censure passed on him by the apocryphal Esdras, 'Not regarding the words of 'the prophet Jeremy, spoken by the mouth of 'the LORD.' (1 Esdras 1:28.) But the Scripture no where condemns him. (Note, 2 Kings 23:29, 30.) Pharaoh, in marching his army through Josiah's territories, against his will, certainly committed an act of hostility. It is evident that Josiah was in possession of the whole land, and not of Judah only: (34:6.) and probably he held the northern parts of it as a grant from the king of Babylon; and was not only in alliance with him, but bound to guard his frontiers against hostile invaders. Doubtless the kings of Judah had been in some measure dependent on the kings of Assyria and Babylon, from the time of Manasseh's captivity and release. Pharaoh declared indeed by his ambassadors, that he did not mean to attack Josiah, but to march against a power with which he was at war. He was, however, in the heart of Josiah's kingdom before he sent this embassy, and he avowed his intention of attacking his ally: and therefore Josiah may fairly, on both accounts, be justified from the charge of unjustly meddling with a war that did not belong to him; for no king upon earth would think it unjust to declare war against another prince, who should forcibly march an army into his dominions, in order to attack another prince who was in alliance with him. It is true the ambassadors assured Josiah that "God had commanded Pharaoh to make haste;" and said, "Forbear thee from meddling with God who is with me, that he destroy thee not:" and he is therefore said, "not to have hearkened to the words of Necho, from the mouth of God." But Necho produced no proof, that he was a prophet of JEHOVAH, and Sennacherib had used similar language to Hezekiah, who had paid no regard to it. (Note, 2 Kings 18:25.) The word used by Necho, (אֱלֹהִים) may signify gods, or idols and critics have noted, that the expression "from the mouth of God," is no where used in the Hebrew Bible, for a revelation from the true God, but that it is always "from the mouth of the LORD."—It is not indeed at all probable, that God had commanded Pharaoh-necho by Jeremiah, or by any other prophet, to undertake this expedition: for in that case Josiah would doubtless have been informed, and have submitted. And if Pharaoh had received any monition in a dream or vision, which he concluded to be from the God of Israel, (and so meant something more, than his own auguries and superstitions;) Josiah might not give credit to his testimony, in matters so closely connected with his own interests.—Josiah, however, seems to have been guilty of precipitation, and in not inquiring of the Lord when thus warned, before he proceeded to attack so formidable an enemy: his premature and violent death might therefore be a rebuke for his rashness; but it was chiefly a judgment on a hypocritical and wicked generation. Whatever sin Josiah committed, he doubtless repented of it: and the final state of one, who habitually lives a life of repentance, faith, and obedience, cannot be affected, by the manner in which he is suddenly taken away.—The second chariot seems to have been one that wait-hold, they are written in the book of the kings of Israel and Judah.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Jehoahaz succeeds Josiah, but Necho carries him into Egypt; and makes Jehoiakim king, 1—4. He reigns wickedly and is put in chains by Nebuchadnezzar, who carries some of the sacred vessels to Babylon, 5—7. Jehoiachin is made king, who in a short time is carried captive to Babylon, with other of the sacred vessels; and Zedekiah succeeds, 8—10. He reigns very wickedly, despises the warnings of Jeremiah, and rebels against Nebuchadnezzar, 11—13. The sins of the priests and people cause the utter destruction of Jerusalem, and the desolation of the land, for seventy years, 14—21 Cyrus's proclamation for rebuilding the temple, 22, 23.

THEN [a] the people of the land took [b] Jehoahaz the son of Josiah, and made him king in his father's stead in Jerusalem.

ed for him in case of necessity; into which he was removed, the other being perhaps covered with blood.

V. 25—27. Though the people would not imitate Josiah's eminent piety, and disliked his reformation; yet they highly respected his character, and were sensible that they had sustained a very great loss. 'Whensoever they mentioned 'any calamity, they mentioned that as the great-'est that had befallen them.' Bp. Patrick.—The book of Lamentations of Jeremiah was written on another occasion: (Preface to Lamentations:) and what that prophet composed on the death of Josiah has not come down to us. But both the prophet and the people, took several methods of doing honor to the memory of their prince; and of perpetuating the lamentations made on the account of his death; it is probable by an annual commemoration of that fatal event. (Note, Jer. 22:10—12.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—19.

Extensive good may be done by persons in authority, who spare no labor or expense, in promoting the honor of God; and who unite their example and influence with most zealous endeavors, to excite and encourage other members of the community to do their duty.—Even those who teach others, and are "holy to the LORD," not only by office, but in their hearts and lives, need to be repeatedly exhorted and charged, to serve God and his church, with increasing zeal and persevering diligence; and when one service is finished, to proceed with alacrity to another.—God alone can efficaciously sanctify and prepare our hearts for his holy worship; but the blessing must be sought, for ourselves and others, by attending to our several duties: and ministers should always sanctify themselves, before they attempt to prepare the people for the ordinances of God. In this way revivals of religion are both manifested and forwarded; and sacred ordinances at once honor the Lord, and become 'means of grace' to the souls of men. The support of them, in an orderly and public manner, must always be attended with expense; and the multitude of the poor will often be unable to defray it. On this account religion will, in some places and at some times, be neglected, to the discouragement of many, and the ruin of far more: it then becomes a noble generosity for kings, princes, rulers, and wealthy persons, to step forward and to communicate liberally to the assistance of the poor, that they may not want "the Bread of life" for their souls; and God will honor those who thus honor him. None however, are more bound to liberality in such cases, than the superior clergy, who enjoy large revenues appropriated to the maintenance of religion: for surely they ought willingly to assist their poorer brethren, who commonly do a great proportion of the work, without even a decent provision for themselves and their families! Were these things duly attended to, the service of God might be prepared, and his ordinances conducted, in harmony and to edification: while mutual love would be cemented; discouragements and temptations to envy, discontent, and revilings, would be obviated; and the affluent might expect to enjoy their abundance, in reputation, beloved by their inferiors, with the blessing of God, and to his glory: while the whole would cause numbers to pray for each other, and "to abound in many thanksgivings unto God." (Notes, 2 Cor. 9:6—15.)—Those who are continually so taken up in the work of God and his church, that they cannot attend to their secular interests, ought particularly to be provided for by their brethren who have more leisure. In all things indeed we need reciprocal assistance; and they, who are much employed in the public exercises of religion, should be cautioned not to neglect their own souls, and the private exercise of meditation, and communion with God.—Alas! how are the ordinances of God disregarded, or formally attended on! The church in its best days has fallen short hitherto of what it ought to be at all times: our most religious hours, in public or private, need forgiveness; and the mercy of God, through the Savior's atonement, must still be our only plea, to the close of our days.—Very great exertions are requisite to produce even an outward attendance to religion: and after all, except we depend entirely on divine grace, the most excellent means and instruments will be ineffectual, and serve only to demonstrate the strength of man's depravity, and the justice of God in the sinner's condemnation: and abused mercies will after a time be withdrawn.

V. 20—27.

No man suffers or ever will suffer, who has not merited his sufferings; yet public persons are often laid aside or removed, to punish the wickedness of the community: and even their indiscretions, contrary to their general character, and the fatal consequences of them, may be permitted as a national judgment.—We are not bound to believe all those, who profess to speak by the authority of God: but it is always right to act with caution, to search the scriptures, to seek the Lord's direction by prayer, and to consult wise, experienced, and pious friends; that we may discover as far as possible, what is the truth and will of God concerning us, and that we may not be found in any instance to fight against him.—Men seldom prosper in those measures which are unadvisedly adopted: and those, who are honored with great usefulness, should be doubly circumspect in their conduct, and careful of their lives; because so many are interested in them.—Believers, however, even when taken away by a sudden or premature death, are removed to a better world: and their survivors should honor them, notwithstanding their imperfections; and will frequently perceive that they have great cause to mourn for them. (Note, Is. 57:1,2.) Yet many join in lamenting the death, and commemorating the goodness, of useful men, who neither regard their admonitions, nor imitate their examples. And many mourn over their own calamities, who do not repent, and forsake those sins, which have provoked

V. 10. Jehoiakim, probably, died towards the close of the year: and soon after the entrance of the new year, Nebuchadnezzar took Jehoiachin captive, and carried him to Babylon, with many other prisoners, and many of the vessels of the temple. V. 13. Swear, &c.] Nebuchadnezzar had placed Zedekiah on the throne, requiring him to swear allegiance to him by the God of Israel. Having received his authority in this manner, and holding it by such a tenure, he could not revolt from the king of Babylon, without perjury, treachery, and injustice: and in his case the impolicy of his conduct was equal to his impiety, and made way for the punishment of it. V. 14, 15. (Marg. Ref.) The Lord acted towards Judah, as a man would do, who had the welfare of his son much at heart, and would lose no time, but meet him with warnings as soon as he began to turn aside; missing no opportunity and sparing no pains: for God had compassion on the people; and proceeded, as if reluctantly, to execute vengeance, and to give up Jerusalem, 16 But they [c] mocked the messengers of God, and [d] despised his words, and [e] misused his prophets, until [f] the wrath of the LORD arose against his people, [g] till there was no * remedy.

17 Therefore [h] he brought upon them [i] the king of the Chaldees, [k] who slew their young men with the sword, [l] in the house of their sanctuary, and had [m] no compassion upon young man or maiden, old man, or him that stooped for age: he gave them all into his hand.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

When the wickedness of nations provokes God to remove wise and pious princes, and to advance others of a contrary character; avowed impiety and desolating judgments may be expected to come in like a flood, and to bear down all before them. Indeed Providence often raises up such wicked rulers, one after another, to scourge a guilty land; and then every change proves a step towards more complete destruction.—Infatuated counsels and treacherous measures concur in bringing ruin upon those, who, in proud contempt of God, reject the warnings of his ministers from his word; and who thus "stiffen their neck, and harden their heart from turning unto the LORD."—Yet he would not punish whole kingdoms for the impiety of their rulers, did not the people also transgress very much: but when nations, favored with his word and ordinances, become so corrupt, that nobles, priests, and people imitate, and even exceed, the abominations of the heathen; and add the shameless profanation of things most sacred, and the most obstinate contempt of his holy word, to all their other crimes; what can be expected but miseries as remarkable as their wickedness? And when the mockery and persecution of his ministers is added to all the rest, the "wrath of the LORD will arise against such a people, till there be no remedy." He indeed delights in mercy, and is glorified by the repentance of sinners, and by pardoning and saving the penitent. The whole plan of redemption, the warnings, invitations, and entreaties of his word, and his long-suffering towards us, prove his rich compassion and love: but these endearing attributes are exercised in exact consistency with his justice, holiness, and truth, and according to the counsel of his infallible wisdom; and when no means, mercies, or warnings are effectual to bring sinners to repentance, there is no remedy, but he must vindicate the honor of his despised authority, patience, and mercy, in their condign punishment.—Nothing, except obstinate impenitent unbelief and iniquity, can ruin our souls; but nothing can save those, who persist in rejecting the salvation of the gospel: for the honor of the truths and ordinances of God demands the destruction of men, who disgrace them while they profess to glory in them. Yet the ministers of the gospel must not yield to despondency or resentment, however disappointed, mocked, or misused: they must copy the patience and forbearance of the Lord; and spare no pains, and leave no proper method untried, to bring sinners to repentance.

V. 17—23.

The instruments of divine vengeance against devoted nations are of themselves disposed for their bloody work; and the Lord arms them with power, and gives up the objects of his righteous indignation into their hands. Then, no age or sex, no sacredness of place or character, will move compassion; but all will be involved in one common calamity: and the abused privileges, in which hypocrites confide, will both add to their guilt, and enhance the poignancy of their sufferings. Yet all the miseries of this life are temporal; but the punishment of the wicked in another world is eternal.—Even the circumstances of severe calamities often forebode and make way for their removal. When the executioners of vengeance have cut off the more desperate transgressors, and the rest are humbled by means of their sufferings, and for their sins; the Lord "stirs up the spirit" of some instrument of his mercy, who patronises the afflicted, and becomes their deliverer: and "the gates of hell shall never prevail against his church."

THE BOOK OF EZRA.

It is generally agreed that Ezra wrote this book, and also the preceding books of Chronicles. It is likewise recorded by the Jewish writers, that he revised all the preceding parts of Scripture, and published a correct copy of the whole: and indeed this account appears highly probable. He is not called a prophet, in the sacred Scripture: yet there can be no doubt, that he performed these services under the guidance of the Holy Spirit; as no distinction is made in the New Testament between one part and another of that volume, which was then called "The Oracles of God," and as such sanctioned by our Lord and his apostles. The prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah confirm the history contained in the former part of this book: and as Ezra alone records the rebuilding of the temple; whatever in the New Testament relates to the temple, as then standing, is in some sense a sanction to the authenticity of the narrative: though I do not recollect any express references to it except in the genealogies. Neither does the book appear to contain any direct prophecies: but it is written in so pious a strain, and so much in the manner of the other Scriptures, that it has strong internal evidences of divine inspiration. As express mention is made in it of Jeremiah's prophecies, and plain intimations are given of Isaiah's extraordinary prediction concerning Cyrus; (1:1—4.) it is evident that the writings of these prophets were then extant: and the constant reference to the law of Moses and the preceding histories in this book, and that of Nehemiah, proves the same respecting them.—Ezra was peculiarly had in honor by the ancient Jews, and is so by the modern: and to this we must ascribe the forgery of several other books, under his name, especially the two apocryphal books of Esdras, or Ezra; for forgeries they undoubtedly are, and of a much later date than the authentic record of Ezra.—This history opens with the proclamation of Cyrus, the return of a company of Jews, and their attempts to rebuild the city and temple, and to re-inhabit the land: it proceeds to record the opposition with which they met, the delays this occasioned, and how, after a time, they in part succeeded. At length, about seventy-eight or seventy-nine years afterwards, (concerning the most of which nothing is recorded,) Ezra himself arrived with a commission, and large powers and grants, from Artaxerxes, and with many attendants: and the narrative closes with an account of the sin of the Jews in marrying heathen wives; Ezra's grief, humble confession, and prayers on that account; and his pious endeavors to separate his people from idolaters.—In this and the subsequent history, the Jews no longer appear as an independent prosperous nation, governed by kings of their own race: but a small remnant, returned from captivity, by the favor of the Persian kings, and under their protection and dominion; and struggling, often feebly, with many difficulties and enemies: yet in this condition, they were enabled to re-establish the worship of God at the temple in Jerusalem, to which they outwardly adhered till the coming of Christ; being effectually cured of gross idolatry, though in other respects, exceedingly prone to disobedience.—During the captivity nothing is recorded of the history of Israel, except what may be collected from the prophecies of Ezekiel and Daniel: and exceedingly little is contained in the Scripture of their condition, during 536 years, till the birth of Christ, compared with the regular history given of the nation from the days of Moses to the captivity. The old dispensation was about to expire and make way for Christianity; the Spirit of prophecy was about to be withdrawn for a season; and the people had so often and so flagrantly violated their national covenant, that they were not honored and noticed as they had been in former ages

CHAP. I.

Cyrus issues a proclamation, allowing the Jews to go up to Jerusalem and build the temple; and exhorting those who staid behind to assist them, 1—4. Many prepare to return, and others contribute to the expense, 5, 6. Cyrus restores the vessels of the temple to Sheshbazzar, 7—11.

NOW [a] in the first year of Cyrus king of Persia, that the word of the LORD [b] by the mouth of Jeremiah might be fulfilled, the LORD stirred up the spirit of Cyrus king of Persia, [c] that he * made a proclamation throughout all his kingdom, and put it also in writing, saying,

2 Thus saith Cyrus king of Persia, The [d] LORD God of heaven [e] hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth; and [f] he hath charged me to build him an house at Jerusalem which is in Judah.

3 Who is there among you of all his people? [g] his God be with him, and let him go up to Jerusalem, which is in Judah, and build the house of the LORD God of Israel, ([h] he is the God,) which is in Jerusalem.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1—4. (2 Chr. 36:22,23.) Nebuchadnezzar reigned, after the first captivity of the Jews in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, forty-five years. (Note, 1 Kings 24:1.) His son Evil-merodach was slain by Neriglissar, his brother-in-law, after he had reigned two years; and probably Jehoiachin died before him. (Note, 2 Kings 25:27—30.) After four years Neriglissar was slain in battle by Cyrus: after a few months Belshazzar, the son of Evil-merodach, mounted the throne; and at the end of seventeen years he was slain in Babylon by Cyrus. (Dan. 5:) Then Cyaxares, or Darius the Mede, the uncle and father-in-law of Cyrus, succeeded to the throne of all these kingdoms; and after two years he died, and left the whole of them to Cyrus, who, in the first year after his predecessor's death, proclaimed liberty to the captive Jews. This is the first computation of the seventy years of the Babylonish captivity. (Note, 2 Chr. 36:21.)—As Daniel prospered in the reign of Darius the Mede, and of Cyrus the Persian, there can be little doubt, that he was instrumental in procuring this extraordinary proclamation in favor of the Jews: and probably he shewed that prince the prophecy of Isaiah, which was known to have been long extant, and in which he was predicted by name, and his successes were described; and by which he was appointed to rebuild Jerusalem and the temple: and also those of Jeremiah, which foretold the exact duration of the captivity. (Notes, Is. 13:17. 21:1—5. 41:25. 44:25—28. 45:1—6. Jer. 25:10—13. 27:4—9. 29:10. 50: 51: Dan. 1:17—20. 6:25—28.) The prophecy of Isaiah was delivered about 120 years before the temple was destroyed; and about the same time before the birth of Cyrus. These predictions, set before Cyrus, by a person of Daniel's venerable age, and high reputation for wisdom, and eminent station, seem to have produced in the mind of this prudent and humane conqueror, a conviction that the God of Israel was the true God, and that the captive Jews were his chosen people, and Jerusalem the place where he was especially pleased to be worshipped. Thus "The LORD stirred up his spirit" to issue a proclamation, which was publicly made known in every place, by heralds appointed for that service, and also committed to writing; that the Jews were now set at liberty, and should be protected, in returning to Jerusalem and rebuilding the temple.—In this proclamation Cyrus called the God of Israel, "JEHOVAH, the God of Heaven," and avowed that he was "THE God," in contradistinction to all others that were so called. He acknowledged, that he had received his dominions from JEHOVAH, whether acquired by inheritance or conquest. These, being far superior to any other empire then in the world, (as comprising the dominions of the Medes and Persians increased by those of the Assyrians, Babylonians, and others,) were called in the customary style, "all the kingdoms of the earth." And he declared that "the LORD had charged him, to build him an house at Jerusalem." Some think that this was done in a vision vouchsafed to him; but probably it was his inference from Isaiah's prophecies. He also wished the Jews success in the name of the Lord, and in some sense prayed for his powerful and favorable presence with them. And he exhorted others, in every place, to help those who went upon this undertaking, with such things as were needful for their expenses, and for accomplishing their pious intentions. Some interpret this as an order to the rulers of the provinces, to supply them from the public revenues: (Notes, 7:16—28.) others suppose that Cyrus allowed the Jews to collect voluntary contributions from his subjects at large; and some confine it to the Jews, who did not go up to Jerusalem, who were exhorted to assist their brethren that did. Without such assistance, many, that "remained in any place," waiting an opportunity of going up to Jerusalem, would have been eventually hindered.—Besides affording assistance to the Jews for their journey; the people in general, were allowed, and even reminded, to send oblations for the temple, which was about to be built at Jerusalem.—By this decree the Jews, who had been held in bondage and captivity, were virtually released, provided they chose to engage in this enterprise. Any attempt of this kind would previously have been punishable as rebellion; but now, the government being favorable, their opposers would be restrained, and many would readily help them on that account alone.—As the kings of Persia still retained the sovereignty of the land, it could be no real impolicy to encourage the people to re-inhabit and cultivate a fertile territory, which had long lain desolate. But this measure was so contrary to the ancient prejudices and superstitions of these kings, that it was probably dictated by conscience, and a sense of duty to the God of heaven: though we find nothing in the subsequent history of this prince to favor a conclusion, that he finally renounced idolatry, and became a true worshipper of JEHOVAH. The proclamation, however, was 5 Then rose up the chief of the fathers of Judah and Benjamin, and the priests, and the Levites, with all them [k] whose spirit God had raised to go up to build the house of the LORD, which is in Jerusalem.

6 And all they that were about them strengthened their hands with vessels of silver, with gold, with goods, and with beasts, and with precious things, beside all that was [l] willingly offered.

7 ¶ Also [m] Cyrus the king brought forth the vessels of the house of the LORD, which [n] Nebuchadnezzar had brought forth out of Jerusalem, and had put them in the house of his gods; honorable to God; and would encourage the Jews to adhere to their religion, and be more zealous for it; and perhaps induce many of the Gentiles to respect, and even to embrace it.

V. 5, 6. Some readers may perhaps wonder, that, on this proclamation of Cyrus, the Jews did not assemble in one body, and directly go and take possession of their ancient inheritances: but a little reflection shews the matter in another light.—The city and temple lay a heap of ruins, and it would cost immense labor and expense to rebuild them. The land was either wholly desolate, or occupied by encroaching neighbors; and in either case, it would require much time and labor to procure for themselves habitations and provisions. The journey was long, arduous, and perilous, to those who were attended with families and substance: (Note, Gen. 31:23,24.) and many enemies would endeavor to plunder them by the way, as far as they dared and were able. (Notes, 8:21—23. Neh. 2:7.) None of the Jews had seen Jerusalem or the temple, except such as were considerably above fifty years of age; at which period of life the spirit of enterprise commonly begins to decline: and those, who had merely seen it as children, would have little stimulating recollection of it. Few were attached to the temple by true piety: and most of them wanted even that attachment, which men naturally feel for the land of their nativity; having been born in the places, where they were then settled. Some persons of true and eminent piety were so situated, that they did not think it their duty to remove; as Daniel in the court of Cyrus: others would be hindered by the infirmities of old age, and the peculiar circumstances of their families and connexions. In short, the difficulties, hardship, and peril were manifest; the success of the attempt would be doubtful to all, but those who were "strong in faith:" its temporal advantages were remote and precarious, and not worth the venture; especially to such as had obtained comfortable settlements or occupations, in the land of their captivity. Even the spiritual advantages would appear to the pious mind, more intended for posterity than for that generation; and to engage in it, in this view, would require vigorous faith, lively hope, and an active zeal for the honor of God, and the benefit of his church, and establishment of his worship, in ages to come.—We may conclude, that in consequence of the captivities, many Israelites, and some of the Jews, were finally incorporated with the heathen, among whom they dwelt: yet these calamities seem to have had a very good effect on considerable numbers.—The chief fathers of Judah and Benjamin, who had the greatest influence in their tribes, first moved in this undertaking; and they were joined by the leading men among the priests and Levites, which doubtless rendered the design more honorable: and thus a considerable number were encouraged to attend them; whilst others both assisted them, and sent valuable oblations for the intended temple.—Many more returned, than we read of being carried away captive: (Notes, 2:64—67. Jer. 52:28—30.) but as the land had been utterly desolated, all the surviving inhabitants must have been driven into other countries, and most of them into those lands, which had been subject to the kings of Babylon, and which were now fallen under the dominion of the kings of Persia: and doubtless many of the ten tribes accompanied the Jews at this time. It is, however, evident that a great majority, even of the latter, chose to continue in the settlements which they had there gained: some of them afterwards returned, but very many never did; and immense numbers of Jews were from that time dispersed, in every city and country, over all that part of the world. So that the new settlement, in Judea and at Jerusalem, formed but a small part of that people, as they continued to be distinguished from other nations: for they still increased and multiplied very rapidly, according to the promise of God to their fathers.—It is worthy of observation, that no Jews, who chose to go, were excluded by Cyrus's proclamation: yet the language of the sacred historian implies, that none would actually have gone, if He, who "stirred up the spirit of Cyrus," had not also "raised the spirit of the people," to avail themselves of this permission: the original words are the same in both clauses. This transaction, (as Archbishop Usher has particularly observed,) furnishes a most striking illustration, or, as I would rather say, representation, of the way in which the gospel is proposed to sinners, and embraced by believers. It is in general set before the ruined descendants of Adam; with the Savior's most solemn assurance, that "him who cometh ... he will in no wise cast out." Yet "no man can come unto him, except the Father draw him." On one pretence or other, all who are left to themselves "neglect so great salvation," and are justly condemned. But God, by his preventing grace, "stirs up the spirits" of some, were brought up from Babylon unto Jerusalem.

V. 7—11. Some of the vessels of the temple had been cut in pieces by the victors: (2 Kings 24:13.) but the most valuable had been providentially preserved through all the succeeding revolutions, and were now ordered by Cyrus to be restored to Sheshbazzar; and so were at last brought back to Jerusalem, and again employed in the service of the sanctuary.—It is generally agreed, that the ark was lost or destroyed, when the temple was burnt: and it is likely, that by the absence of it, and the visible glory, 'God would signify, 'he was withdrawing his presence from that house 'of stone, to dwell in the temple of Christ's body, 'who offered himself to God, and thereby put an 'end to these figurative sacrifices.' Bp. Patrick. The knives were used for slaying and preparing the sacrifices, as the original word signifies; and the vessels, for receiving the blood, for the meat-offerings, and other similar purposes. (Marg. Ref.)—The sum total of the vessels here stated far exceeds the particular account given of them: but it is supposed, that many spoons, tongs, and other instruments of service, not before numbered, were included.—Sheshbazzar may signify joy in tribulation; and it is supposed that this name was given, by the kings of Babylon, to the same person whom the Jews called Zerubbabel, which signifies a stranger at Babylon. He was the grandson of Jehoiachin by Salathiel, and the heir of the house of David: as such he was regarded by the conquerors; he possessed authority over the captive Jews; and he was authorized, and willingly undertook, to lead those back, who now returned to rebuild the city and temple. (Marg. Ref. e.—2:2. 3:2,8. 5:14—16. Note, Jer. 22:28—30.)

Sheshbazzar. (8) שֵׁשְׁבַּצַּר. This name appears to be compounded of שֵׁשׁ, fine linen, and בְּצַר, in affliction.—The wearing of fine linen and white garments was an expression of rejoicing.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4.

As the architect progressively executes every part of the plan, which he had delineated for his intended structure, till the whole is completed; so God in his providence performs in due order all the prophecies of his word: a great proportion of his grand design has already been accomplished, and revolving ages will hasten the performance of all the rest, in the appointed periods.—Difficulties, which to us appear impossibilities, form no obstruction to Omnipotence. The Lord our God turneth the hearts of kings, as he does the rivers of waters, which way he pleases: (Note, Prov. 21:1.) he subverts the deep laid foundations of mighty empires, and establishes others in their room; he lays aside the executioners of his vengeance, when their work is done, to make way for the instruments of his mercy: he gives, as he sees good, abilities, success, and authority; and then secretly disposes men's minds to fulfil his word and do his will, and over-rules every thing for the benefit of his church, and of those who trust in him.—When he has work to do, they, whom he has chosen to perform it, find their minds enlarged to entertain noble designs; and, forgetful of their former habits, maxims, and superstitions, they serve his cause with all the authority, which he has conferred on them. Even they, who live and die strangers to the power of true religion, have often received deep convictions of "his eternal power and Godhead," and of their obligations and accountableness to "the God of heaven:" and under these convictions, they have made public and honorable confessions to him, have shewn for a time a regard for his authority, and have done many and great things for his cause and people; speaking the language of piety, and being very useful to his worshippers: and yet at last they have relapsed into their former idolatry or ungodliness! (Notes, 7:11—28.)—If such things have heretofore been done in fulfilling former prophecies; the Lord is equally able and faithful to provide for the ruin of every antichrist, the conversion of the Jews, and the calling of all the Gentiles into his church.—In every useful undertaking, all should endeavor to be helpful; and it bodes well, when princes and ministers of religion take the lead, and give the example, in arduous and self-denying services. Some may be useful by their labors, some with their substance, and all by their prayers, to the common cause of truth and righteousness: and whatever is done willingly, and from love to God and his people, will be graciously accepted.

V. 5—11.

No time should be lost in setting about those duties which belong to us in our several stations: and in stirring up others to abound in love and good works, we should give them an example.—That which is devoted to the service of the Lord, is intrusted to his protection: and he will especially keep and preserve those, whom he has "purified unto himself to be a peculiar people, zealous of good works." Even the very hairs of their head are all numbered; and whatever tribulations they may pass through, no true believer shall perish; but they shall all be forth-coming, at that day "when the LORD shall make up his jewels."—Salvation is fully prepared in Jesus Christ; "all power in heaven and earth is given unto him;" the proclamation of the gospel is general to every creature. But pride, worldly lusts, and unbelief, render us averse to the gracious proposal: and it would be made in vain, did not the Lord raise up the spirits of a remnant, "according to the election of grace," to renounce all for the sake of Christ and his salvation. Those who prefer carnal things, to the eternal blessings which he confers, will find, that their pride and love of sin aggravate, and do not excuse, the guilt of their unbelief. Those, who feel a willingness to accept of what they have heretofore neglected, may come with encouragement; for Jesus "will in no wise cast them out." And if we by grace have been enabled to receive this salvation, and to bring forth the fruits of it; while we take the comfort of it, we shall give him the glory, and offer our fervent prayers, that others also may "be made willing in the day of his power."

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1. Province, &c.] (Marg. Ref. a.) This term seems to denote Judea, as now become a province of the Persian empire.—Some of the same persons returned, who had been carried captive, and the children or descendants of the others.

V. 2. These were the chief fathers, who were next in authority to Zerubbabel, and assisted him in this expedition. Jeshua, or Joshua, was the high priest, the grandson of Seraiah, who was slain by Nebuchadnezzar. (2 Kings 25:18,21. Comp. 1 Chr. 6:14,15. with Note, Hag. 1:1.)—Nehemiah and Mordecai were not the same persons of whom we afterwards read, who bore these names; for they lived many years later. (Neh. 1:1. Esth. 2:5.)—As these persons renounced many advantages, and encountered many hardships and dangers, in attempting to rebuild the temple and city, and resume possession of the promised land; it was proper that their names should be recorded, as a mark of honorable distinction to them and their descendants. 'Their land and their 'cities had been laid so desolate, ... and were in-'fested also by such bad neighbors, that it was a 'great piece of generosity in these men to return 'thither: and their names are recorded to the 'eternal honor of them, and of their posterity; 'they being the first planters of this country, after 'it had been laid waste.' Bp. Patrick. The people of Israel.] 'They who were called "the 'children of the province" before, are now called ' "the people of Israel:" for from him they were 'derived, though most of them were of the tribe 'of Judah.' Bp. Patrick. (Note, 1:5,6.)

V. 3—29. The Register, in the book of Nehemiah, answers to this here given in so many particulars, that there can be no doubt that the same is meant in both places. In general, the names and the numbers of each family are nearly the same; and the sum total is computed in both exactly alike. Yet there are several considerable variations, in names and numbers, which cannot be readily and satisfactorily accounted for. The most material of these are marked in the margin. —It is probable, that Ezra, when he wrote his history, many years after the return of the Jews to Babylon, copied this register from the public records without alteration.—Some think, that several who had their names inserted in the register, altered their minds, or died before the company arrived at Jerusalem; and that others came forward, so as to complete the same number in all, (Notes, Neh. 7:5,6,73.)—The word children is sometimes used for the descendants from the several heads of families; at other times for those, whose ancestors belonged to the cities mentioned in connexion with them.

V. 30. The children of Magbish are not named in Nehemiah.

V. 35. It is uncertain, whether Senaah be the name of a person, or a place; but the greatest number of persons stated in the whole register are called the children of Senaah.

V. 36—39. Above four thousand priests went up to Jerusalem on this occasion; which was a very great number, in proportion to the rest of the company: yet only four, out of the twenty-four courses instituted by David, seem to have returned: at least only four of the persons, after whom the courses were first named, as here mentioned; namely, Jedaiah, Immer, Harim, and Pashur, who was the son of Malchijah: (1 Chr. 9:12. 24:7—9,14.) and his name appears to have stood in the public records, as head of his course, instead of his father's. The priests, however, were afterwards divided into twenty-four courses, under the ancient names, in order to preserve regularity in their ministrations.

V. 40—42. The very small number of Levites, compared with the multitude of priests, who returned from Babylon, is very remarkable. Perhaps during a course of years, having no employment in their appropriate services, they generally entered on other occupations; and felt little inducement or inclination to leave them, in order to be the assistants of the priests, in the present desolated condition of Judah and Jerusalem. But it may be supposed, that the priests, having a more sacred and honorable office, were reluctant to be deprived of it, and more ready to resume the exercise of their ministry.

V. 43—54. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 8:20. 1 Chr 9:2.)

V. 55—58. These were persons descended from the remains of the devoted Canaanites, who had been brought into bondage by Solomon; (Note, 1 Kings 9:20—22.) and so their posterity were employed in menial services, perhaps about the sanctuary, along with the Nethinims: and 59 And these were they which went up from Tel-melah, [p] Tel-harsa, Cherub, Addan, and Immer; but they could not shew their father's house, and their * seed, whether they were of Israel:

60 The children [q] of Delaiah, the children of Tobiah, the children of Nekoda, six hundred fifty and two.

61 ¶ And of [r] the children of the priests: the children of Habaiah, the children of Koz, the children of Barzillai: which took a wife of the daughters of [s] Barzillai the Gileadite, and was called after their name:

62 These sought their register among those that were reckoned by genealogy, but they were not found: [t] therefore [†] were they, as polluted, put from the priesthood.

63 And the [‡] Tirshatha said unto them, that they [u] should not eat of the most holy things, till there stood up a priest with [x] Urim and with Thummim.

64 The whole congregation together was [y] forty and two thousand three hundred and threescore, 65 Beside their [z] servants and their maids, of whom there were seven thousand three hundred thirty and seven: and there were among them [a] two hundred singing men and singing women.

66 Their horses were seven hundred thirty and six; their mules, two hundred forty and five;

67 Their camels, four hundred thirty and five; their asses, six thousand seven hundred and twenty.

68 ¶ And some of the chief of the fathers, when they came to the house of the LORD which is at Jerusalem, [b] offered freely for the house of God to set it up [c] in his place:

69 They gave after their ability, unto [d] the treasure of the work, threescore and one thousand drams of gold, and five thousand pounds of silver, and one hundred priests' garments.

70 So [e] the priests, and the Levites, and some of the people, and the singers, and the porters, and the Nethinims, dwelt in their cities, and all Israel in their cities.

though both the Nethinims and "the children of Solomon's servants," were of Gentile extraction, and not admitted to the privileges of Israelites; yet they seem to have been more ready to return to Jerusalem, than the Levites were.

V. 61—63. Either Habaiah, or Koz, being of the sacerdotal family, had married one of Barzillai's daughters; and his posterity perhaps thought their descent from him, more honorable than their priestly character, and so neglected to preserve their genealogy. Yet, on their return from captivity, they desired to be admitted to the service of the sanctuary: but, not being able to trace their genealogy, they were excluded by the Tirshatha, (that is, the governor, or Zerubbabel, Neh. 8:9.) until a high priest should arise with Urim and Thummim, who might, by immediate revelation from God, decide upon their case. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Ex. 28:30.) But such a high priest was not vouchsafed under the second temple. 'The Jews generally acknowledge, that there 'was no Urim and Thummim under the second 'temple; and even they that say there was, (be-'cause it was necessary the high priest should have 'his garments complete,) yet say, there was no 'answer from God given by it.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 64. The number of the several families amounts only to twenty-nine thousand eight hundred and eighteen; and those in Nehemiah to thirty-one thousand and eighty-nine: yet the sum total is in both said to be forty-two thousand three hundred and sixty, besides their servants. (Neh. 7:66,67.) The surplus are supposed to have been priests and Levites who could not produce their genealogy, and Israelites from the other tribes, who accompanied their brethren of Judah and Benjamin. 'It is remarkable that the 'two accounts' (of Ezra and Nehemiah) 'agree in 'the total amount; and the sum of the numbers, as 'separately detailed, will correspond, if to the '29,818, specified by Ezra, we add the 1765 per-'sons reckoned by Nehemiah, which Ezra has 'omitted: and on the other hand, to the 31,089 enu-'merated by Nehemiah, add the 494, which is an 'overplus in Ezra, not noticed by Nehemiah: both 'writers including in the sum total 10,777 of the 'mixed multitude, not particularized in the indi-'vidual detail. ... Prideaux attributes the differ-'ence to alterations made by Nehemiah, in com-'pliance with changes, that had happened since 'the departure from Babylon. ... The accounts 'unquestionably agreed, when they were receiv-'ed into the canon, except where there might be 'some cause for variation; and probably the dif-'ferences that now exist have originated in the 'carelessness of the copyists.' Grey's Key.

V. 65. Among the servants were "two hundred singing men and singing women," (or two hundred and forty-five, according to Nehemiah) who probably were employed in families, to assist their mournings, or their thanksgivings. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 66, 67. How exceedingly reduced and impoverished does Israel appear in this narrative, compared with the condition of the nation in the days of David and Solomon!—The number of asses, compared with that of the horses, shews in how general use asses were at that time: but horses as belonging to the patriarchs or their descendants, are not mentioned, till the time of David.

V. 68—70. Under the divine protection this company arrived safe at Jerusalem, without any memorable occurrence. They found the city and all around it in ruins, and it seems the neighboring cities totally unoccupied. These they rebuilt as well as they could, and dwelt in them for the present. (Notes, 1 Chr. 9:2. Neh. 7:73.) But the house of God chiefly occupied their thoughts; and it seems that their oblations to it were made, before they separated to seek habitations or subsistence. The whole amounted to nearly eighty thousand pounds sterling, besides the priests' garments; which was a considerable sum for them to contribute in their present poverty: (Note, Neh. 7:70—72.) but probably their brethren who staid behind, contributed part of it; as the sacrifices and the burning of incense at the temple, were for the benefit of those, who worshipped at, or towards, that typical residence of the God of Israel. (Notes, 1 Kings 8:28—30. Dan. 6:10,11.) 'By 'this it appears, that the Jews were not made 'such poor slaves in Babylon as wrought for their ' ... masters, but had liberty to trade, and get 'riches for themselves; some of them being ad-'vanced to considerable offices in the king's 'court.' Bp. Patrick.—The whole history shews, that they were not reduced to personal slavery.—Every thing seems to have been conducted with much harmony and regularity. 'The foundation 'of this poor commonwealth was laid in a marvel-'lous concord. ... They had one heart and soul 'like the first Christians, without which unity no 'people can be preserved. And that it may be 'cherished, they must avoid those things that de-'stroy it, which are (as Joseph Wolphius here ob-'serves,) principally ... self-love, and meddling in 'other men's matters.' Bp. Patrick.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord will honor those, who renounce their own ease or interest for the sake of his service and glory: and all, who avail themselves of the proclamation of liberty and salvation sent in the gospel, have their names recorded in the book of life; whilst others shall be written in the dust of oblivion or disgrace. Those orders of men, which have on one occasion been most zealous in the cause of God, may at another time become most negligent; and the reverse is often exemplified; "for the first shall be last, and the last first." (36—42. 2 Chr. 29:34.)—Those who are ashamed of religion, or undervalue their external relation to God, in times of reproach, persecution, or distress; will have no benefit from it, when it becomes honorable and profitable: and they who have no evidence, that they are, by regeneration and adoption, spiritual priests unto God through Jesus Christ, have no right to the peculiar comforts and privileges of Christians. But there are many cases, of which we cannot judge, but must leave them to be determined at the second coming of our High Priest, whose illuminations and perfections are unchangeable and eternal.—Those who "seek first the kingdom of God," his favor, and his glory, will have all things else added to them: they will readily offer according to their ability for the house and service of God: and "where there is a willing mind it is accepted, according to what a man hath, and not according to what he hath not." (Notes, 2 Cor. 8:1—5,10—15, v. 12.)—Sin always impoverishes and degrades both individuals and societies; but that poverty and degradation are often sanctified, and finally promote their true interest and honor.—Our gracious Lord will carry us through those undertakings, which are entered on according to his will, with an aim to his glory, and in dependence on his assistance; and then we shall be made superior to all difficulties, hardships, and dangers. Thus they, who at the call of the gospel, renounce sin, and return unto the Lord, shall be guarded and guided through all the perils of the way; and arrive safe at those mansions, which are prepared for them in the holy city of our God.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1. It is probable, that the Jews began their journey in the beginning of the spring; and that they did not reach Jerusalem till three or four months after. (7:9.) They employed a short time in providing habitations and necessaries for their families; and then they all met together in the seventh month. This was the season of the first solemnities which occurred after their arrival. On the first day the feasts of trumpets was kept: the great day of atonement followed on the tenth; and the feast of tabernacles began on the fifteenth. All these they seem to have observed with great devotion. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Lev. 23:24—43.)

V. 2, 3. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1:7—11. 2:2.) The Jews built the altar upon the same foundation, and therefore of the same size, with that of Solomon. Probably it was formed of rough stones, with a large hearth of brass on the top. (Note, Ex. 20:21—25, vv. 24,25.) So large an altar, built all of brass, would have cost a sum far beyond their present circumstances. (Note, 2 Chr. 4:1.)—The fear of the tribes or nations around them, whom the people knew to be their enemies, did not induce them to take arms, or to erect fortifications, but to prepare an altar and to offer sacrifices; by which they put themselves under the immediate protection of the Almighty God. (Notes, Josh. 5:2—10.) They began by offering the daily burnt-offerings morning and evening, which constituted the principal part of the stated worship required by the law. (Note, Ex. 29:38—41.)

5 And afterward offered [l] the continual burnt-offering, both of the new moons, and of all the set feasts of the LORD that were consecrated, and of every one that [m] willingly offered a free-will-offering unto the LORD.

6 From the first day of the seventh month began they to offer burnt-offerings unto the LORD. But † the foundation of the temple of the LORD was not yet laid.

7 They [n] gave money also unto the masons, and to the ‡ carpenters: and [o] meat, and drink, and oil unto them of Zidon, and to them of Tyre, to bring cedar-trees from Lebanon to the sea of [p] Joppa, [q] according to the grant that they had of Cyrus king of Persia.

8 ¶ Now in the second year of their coming unto the house of God at Jerusalem, in the second month, began [r] Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, and Jeshua the son of Jozadak, and the remnant of their brethren the priests and the Levites, and all they that were come out of the captivity unto Jerusalem; and appointed the Levites, from [s] twenty years old and upward, to set forward the work of the house of the LORD.

9 Then stood Jeshua with his sons and his brethren, Kadmiel and his sons, the sons of [t] Judah, § together, to set forward the workmen in the house of God: the sons of Henadad, with their sons and their brethren the Levites.

10 And when the builders laid the foundation of the temple of the LORD, they [u] set the priests in their apparel with [x] trumpets, and the Levites [y] the sons of Asaph with cymbals, to praise the LORD, [z] after the ordinance of David king of Israel.

11 And [a] they sang together by course in praising and giving thanks unto the LORD; [b] Because he is good, for his mercy endureth for ever toward Israel. And all the people [c] shouted with a great shout, when they praised the LORD, [d] because the foundation of the house of the LORD was laid.

12 But [e] many of the priests and Levites, and chief of the fathers, who were ancient men, that had seen the first house, [f] when the foundation of this house was laid before their eyes, wept with a loud voice; and many shouted aloud for joy:

13 So that the people could not discern the noise of the shout of joy from the noise of the weeping of the people; for the people [g] shouted with a loud shout, and [h] the noise was heard afar off.

The sacrifices appointed on the several days of the feast of tabernacles, were numerous; and the observance of it seems to have been greatly neglected: yet the returned captives strictly complied with the requirements of the law, 'which put this poor people to great expen-'ses: but their piety was now such, that they valu-'ed nothing so much as the service of God.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 5, 6. Some of the people had come to Jerusalem and had prepared the altar, before the first day of the seventh month. And the rest being assembled as one man, they then began their solemn worship, with the daily sacrifices, those appointed for the new moons, and those for the feast of trumpets, the day of atonement, and the feast of tabernacles. Besides those sacrifices which were expressly appointed, many "willingly offered free-will-offerings unto the LORD." (Marg. Ref.)—Until the temple was completed, it is likely they had erected a tabernacle near the altar, in which the sacred vessels and treasures were deposited and guarded. (Note, 1 Chr. 9:19:21.)

V. 7. It seems, that the Jews were authorized by Cyrus to cut as much timber in Lebanon, as they wanted: but the Zidonians and Tyrians would expect to be paid for their labor; and they would prefer corn, wine, and oil, to money.—"According to the grant that they had of Cyrus;" 'who commanded, I suppose, those of Tyre and 'Zidon to assist them.' Bp. Patrick. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 4:4—6. 6:4.)

V. 8—11. The people did all that they could, during the winter, in making preparations for building the temple; for immense labor must have been requisite, in clearing the ground for the foundation, as well as in providing materials. In the second month, however, of the second year, or in a little more than a year after they left Babylon, Zerubbabel and Jeshua, having appointed the priests and Levites to attend in their courses, laid the foundation of the temple, with songs of praise and thanksgiving to the Lord. temple and its solemn worship, and the blessing and comfort which it had been to their fathers, but had never seen it, were elated with joy that they were once more to have a temple, as the symbol of the Lord's presence with them, and his favor to them, and expressed their joy and thankfulness, by loud acclamations. On the other hand, the old men, who remembered the splendor of the former temple, (which had now been destroyed about fifty-three years,) were led by the recollection of past prosperity, to give vent to their regret in copious tears and loud lamentations. By this they undervalued their present mercies: and it was the more reprehensible, as the priests and Levites, and chief persons, led the way in this unseasonable sorrow, so as to discourage their brethren, and interrupt their fervent praises. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Zech. 4:8—10.)—The temple itself is supposed to have been rebuilt of the same dimensions as before: but probably it was formed chiefly with the old stones dug out of the ruins, and with inferior workmanship; and it was not overlaid with gold, as Solomon's temple had been: neither was it, for a long time at least, surrounded with such magnificent out-buildings. Moreover, the ark of the covenant, the tables of the law, and the mercy-seat, were irrecoverably lost; and it is uncertain whether any thing was substituted in their stead: no visible glory, it is said, now appeared in the most holy place; there were no answers by Urim and Thummim; and no fire from heaven to consume the sacrifices, but common fire was used for that purpose. (Marg. Ref.) These and other circumstances seemed to indicate, that the Lord was not with them as in times past: but they really shewed, that the types were waxing old, and ready to vanish away, by the coming of the great Antitype. (Notes, Jer. 3:16—18. Heb. 8:7—13.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is true wisdom to prefer the service of God to our most urgent temporal concerns.—The greater difficulties, and the more formidable enemies, we are exposed to, the more evidently we need the friendship and assistance of God; and we should be proportionably earnest and constant in seeking and serving him, according to his word, through the great atonement of our heavenly Advocate.—These, who rule over others, should go before them in every good work: and we should worship the Lord in respect of outward things, according to what our circumstances will permit, though we cannot attain to all that is desirable. That, which is expended in obedience to his commandment, will never impoverish us or our families: we should therefore rather save in any thing, than grudge the expense of works of piety and charity, which is like sowing the seed of a future harvest. (Notes, Prov. 11:24,25. Ec. 11:1,2. Luke 6:37,38. Acts 11:27—30. P. O. 19—30, latter part.—Notes, 2 Cor. 9:6—15. P. O. 8—15.)—Every day brings its peculiar duties: these will not be grievous, but pleasant, to the true and consistent servant of the Lord; and when zeal and love prevail, he will be looking out for opportunities of usefulness, and cheerfully bringing his free-will-offerings.—Unanimity, activity, and promptitude, in contriving and executing good designs, will surmount many difficulties, and perform great things in a little time; especially if all orders in society concur in their proper places.—The trumpet of the gospel not only warns the sinner to flee from the wrath to come, but animates the believer to his "work of faith and labor of love."—Every recent token of the loving-kindness of the Lord should remind us to celebrate his former goodness and mercy, and to anticipate future blessings: for, notwithstanding our chastisements and distrustful murmurs, "the LORD is good, and his mercy endureth for ever towards Israel." The conviction of this truth, and the consideration of our own unworthiness, should enlarge our hearts with hope and gratitude, at every renewed token of his favor; and render us joyful at our work, and even amidst our trials. But we are too prone to bemoan lost comforts, disappointments, and scanty possessions; to give way to discontent, impatience, and distrust; and thus to mar our own enjoyment of present mercies, to interrupt the joy of others, and to refuse our God the praise and thanksgiving due unto his name. Against this propensity we should continually watch and pray. Even when we compare the present low state of true piety, and the small success of the gospel, with those primitive times when "great grace was upon all" the company of believers, and "the Lord daily added to the church such as should be saved;" or when we lament declensions in congregations, churches, or nations; we should be careful not to undervalue the present goodness of our God; to "despise the day of small things;" or to weaken our own hands, and discourage the hearts of others, in seeking a more signal and effectual blessing.—In this world, however, joys and sorrows will be blended, for it is a mixed state: hereafter there will be a complete separation; in one place there will be "fulness of joy and pleasures for evermore," in the other there will be eternal weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth. May "Jesus deliver us from the wrath to come," and prepare us for his glorious and eternal felicity; "that where he is, there we may be also."

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1. (Note, 2,10.) The Cutheans, or Samaritans, who had been planted in the land of Israel by Esar-haddon, had perhaps encroached upon the countries belonging to the Jews; and doubtless they were envious of the favor shewn them by the king of Persia: and thus they took occasion to become their determined enemies. But they were chiefly influenced by the enmity which "the seed of the serpent" bears to the true church of God; arising from contrariety of character, and hatred to the holiness of God, as displayed in his holy law, ordinances, truths, and people. And they might also fear, lest the establishment of the true worship of JEHOVAH should expose their spurious religion to disgrace. (Notes, 2 Kings 17:24—28,41. Neh. 13:23—30.)

'partake of the privileges, which were granted to 'the Jews by the king of Persia. ... Though they 'worshipped God, yet they joined other feigned 'gods with him, and therefore could not be admit-'ted into communion with them at the temple.' Bp. Patrick.—The Samaritans professed to worship the God of Israel: yet they were not guided by his word, but by their own imaginations, devices, or traditions, in the service which they rendered to him; and they worshipped with him their tutelar deities: so that their religion was a mixture of idolatry, superstition, and ignorance; far worse at this time than it was when our Lord himself declared, that "they knew not what they worshipped." (Notes, John 4:19—27.)

V. 3. The Samaritans were neither Israelites by birth, nor yet true proselytes; so that the law of God forbad all coalition with them: neither were they included in the decree of Cyrus. Probably, the rulers of the Jews perceived, that they only meant to insinuate themselves, in order to obtain pre-eminence, foment dissensions, introduce their idolatries and superstitions, prejudice the minds of the people against their rulers; and in short to seize the temple, when built, for their own use; or to retard, injure, and put a stop to the work. It was, however, plain, that they did not mean to unite cordially with them, in the worship of the true God alone, according to his written word; and therefore nothing but mischief could have resulted from so unnatural an alliance, which they decidedly declined.

V. 4—6. This opposition of the Samaritans is supposed to have begun, soon after the foundation of the temple was laid. During the remainder of the reign of Cyrus for almost five years, however, they did not openly oppose a work which that prince had commanded: but they discouraged the people, and perhaps intercepted their materials for building; and by bribing counsellors to oppose their application to the ministers of Cyrus, for supplies or protection, they greatly obstructed the design. This would be more easily done, as it is probable that Daniel, the powerful friend of the Jews, died about this time. (Note, Dan. 6:25—28.)—Cambyses, the son of Cyrus, called here (as it is probably supposed,) Ahasuerus, reigned above seven years; and was a very impolitic and wicked prince: but regard to his father's memory, it may be supposed, prevented his attending to the accusations brought by the Samaritans against the Jews. Darius. (5) Notes, 5: 6:

V. 7—9. Upon the death of Cambyses, Smerdis the Magian usurped the throne; and as no other king reigned in Persia, after Cambyses, and before Darius Hystaspis, under whom the temple was finished, he must be the Artaxerxes here mentioned: (Note, 6:13—15.) unless, as some think, Artaxerxes is only another name for Ahasuerus. To him, however, the rulers of the Samaritans wrote a letter, which Ezra seems to have copied from the records of Persia. (Marg. Ref. o.) It was written at first in Syriac, or Chaldee: but perhaps it was entered into the records in Persian; so that Ezra, when he extracted it, again translated it into Syriac: and therefore it stands in the original scriptures in that language, as does all that follows to the end of the sixth chapter.—Bishlam, Mithredath, and Tabeel seem to have been the principal persons, who counselled the people to send this letter; and Rehum and Shimshai, it is probable, drew it up.—The Dinaites, &c. (9) 'These nine nations 'came out of Assyria, Persia, Media, Susiana, 'and other provinces of that vast empire; who 'with one consent joined in this letter, or peti-'tion.' Bp. Patrick. (Marg. Ref. p—s.)

V. 10. Asnapper, &c.] Probably Asnapper was the name by which Esar-haddon was known, in the eastern parts of the Assyrian empire: (2. 2 Kings 19:37.) or as some think, he was a great captain, employed by Esar-haddon in this transaction.

14 Now because we [||] have maintenance from the king's palace, [a] and it was not meet for us to see the king's dishonor, therefore have we sent and certified the king;

15 That search may be made in the book of the records of thy fathers: so shalt thou find in the book of the records, and know, that [b] this city is a rebellious city, and hurtful unto kings and provinces, and that they have [¶] moved sedition [] within the same of old time: [c] for which cause was this city destroyed.

16 We certify the king, that if this city be builded again, and the walls thereof set up, by this means [d] thou shalt have no portion on this side the river.

17 ¶ Then sent the king an answer unto Rehum the chancellor, and to Shimshai the scribe, and to the rest of their [††] companions that dwell in Samaria, and unto the rest beyond the river, [e] Peace, and [f] at such a time.

18 The letter which ye sent unto us hath been plainly read before me.

19 And [‡‡] I commanded, and [g] search hath been made, [h] and it is found that this city of old time hath [§§] made insurrection against kings, and that rebellion and sedition have been made therein.

22 Take heed now that ye fail not to do this: [m] why should damage grow to the hurt of the kings?

23 Now when the copy of king Artaxerxes's letter was read before [n] Rehum, and Shimshai the scribe, and their companions, [o] they went up in haste to Jerusalem unto the Jews, and made them to cease by [¶¶] force and power.

V. 12. The rebellious, &c.] (Marg. Ref. v, x.) After God in his righteous judgments had reduced Judah to subjection under the kings of Babylon, the Jews certainly shewed a very obstinate and treacherous spirit of rebellion; they created their new masters a great deal of trouble, and they provoked them to their own destruction. But in so doing, they transgressed the commandments of their law, by violating their own solemn oaths and engagements. (Notes, 13—16. 2 Kings 24:1.20. 25:6,7. 2 Chr. 36:13. Ez. 17:15—21.)—No attempt at this time had been made to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem; and the Samaritans were not in reality so much displeased at any thing, as at the building of the temple, though they artfully avoided the mention of it: and the letter also contained a most direct false accusation. 'When it is said, there was an order 'from the king, that this city should not be 'built, and accordingly the work was stopped, it 'is thus expressed, ver. 24, "then ceased the work 'of the house of God, which is at Jerusalem." ... 'Thus wicked men compass their ends by lies 'and fallacies, with which they prepossess men's 'minds against the truth.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 13—16. David and Solomon had reigned over all the countries from the river Euphrates, to the river of Egypt: but this was long before the commencement of the Babylonish, or Persian, monarchies. And after the death of Solomon, their successors had been confined within much narrower limits. The Samaritans, however, aimed to insinuate a jealousy into the mind of the king of Persia, that the Jews intended to claim and seize upon all those regions, and hold the whole, as independent on the kings of Persia; than which nothing could be more groundless and absurd. All their offence seems to have been, that they had prepared to defend themselves against their enemies, whilst acting under the authority of Cyrus. The Samaritans cloked their slander and enmity, under the fair pretence of fidelity and gratitude to the king of Persia: the ruling persons among them were maintained by revenues from the court of Persia; and it was not meet for them to see the king's dishonor, and the loss which would accrue to him, if the Jews were allowed to go on with their undertaking. (Notes, 5:3—17.)

We have maintenance, &c. (14) "We are salted with the salt of the palace." Marg.—'It 'seems, they received their stipend in salt, from 'whence it was called a salary.' Bp. Patrick.

Fathers. (15) So they called the kings, who had reigned before Artaxerxes, over those countries.

24 Then ceased the work of the house of God, which is at Jerusalem. [p] So it ceased unto the second year of the reign of [q] Darius king of Persia. [B. C. 520]

p Neh. 6:3,9. Job 20:5. 1 Thes. 2:18.

q 5:5. 6:1. Hag. 1:15.

V. 17—24. The king of Persia found by the records, that Jerusalem had been the seat of government for powerful princes, many ages before; and that afterwards rebellion and sedition had been made in it: and, as thus much was true in the letter of the Samaritans, full credit was given them for all that they advanced, concerning the progress and intentions of the Jews, and the consequences of their proceedings; though nothing could be more improbable, false, and malicious! A commission therefore was sent back, in which the temple was not mentioned; for though that created the jealousy in the minds of the Samaritans, it was little regarded by the king of Persia: (Note, 12.) but they were ordered 'to cause them to cease;" this was sufficient for their purpose; and without delay they forcibly put a stop to the work.—The usurpation of Smerdis did not continue a whole year; so that if he be intended, their commission was soon vacated: but the Jews, being greatly intimidated, and not so zealous as they had been, the work ceased till the second year of Darius, who, having assisted in killing the usurper, was advanced to the throne in his stead. (Note, 5:1,2.) 'It is 'very observable, that in neither of their letters, 'nor in the king's answer, there is one word of 'the command which Cyrus gave; nor any thing 'said of the building of the temple, which was 'the great thing in which they were employed, 'and the building of which could be no damage 'to the king.' Bp. Patrick.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

Every vigorous and successful attempt, to revive or promote true religion, will excite the opposition of Satan, and of "the children of disobedience" in whom he works. Indeed all ungodly men despise or hate holiness: yet they, who do not profess much regard to religion, commonly treat pious persons with mere neglect or ridicule; but hypocrites and heretics have always been the most unwearied and cruel enemies of the true church of God. The labors and lives of his servants undermine their reputation, affront their pride, and expose their hypocrisy: and their enmity is thus imbittered by envy and resentment. Sometimes indeed they seem desirous of being admitted to the fellowship of believers; and avow themselves to be of the same sentiments, and to be minding the same things. But they only want to insinuate themselves, that they may gain pre-eminence, and manage every thing for their own purposes. These "false brethren, unawares crept in, bring in privily damnable heresies," form parties and excite contentions; introduce their own coalition between the world and religion; mislead and prejudice some and pervert others; lessen the influence of pious persons, and render the minds of the people disaffected towards them: and while their lives disgrace the cause, their insinuations "eat as doth a canker," till an internal decay corrodes the very vitals of piety, in every church where they obtain admission, and preserve their authority or influence. Let then all the friends of truth and holiness beware of such characters, and let them withdraw from them: "by their fruits ye shall know them;" and let no plausible pretences, or hopes of support from their superior rank or wealth, bribe Christians to admit them "to build with them," unless they mean to build a Babel, instead of a temple It is true, if you will not have their friendship, you must expect their imbittered resentment, which is more dreaded, but is far less dangerous. By insinuations, objections, and discouragements, they weaken the hands of the Lord's people, and induce them to suspect or dislike their faithful ministers, or their lawful rulers; and by slanders and reproaches, they attempt to prejudice others against them. But it is no wonder, that we cannot enumerate all their practices, when they have the old Serpent for their prompter, and spare neither trouble nor expense, nor crimes of any kind, to accomplish their designs. For the same part is acting over and over again, from age to age, with only circumstantial variations; and the less we are aware of it, the more we are in danger of being injured by it.

V. 7—24.

The gates of hell, in directly assaulting the church of Christ, often labor to excite rulers to suppress his truths and ordinances, by statutes and penal sanctions. To this end ungodly men bestow great pains to obtain the ear of princes. If they find them disposed to countenance pious Christians, they use deceitful methods to poison their minds with prejudices and suspicions. But when weak and wicked kings succeed to the thrones, which have been filled by wiser men; these slanderers venture to speak more plainly: and professing great loyalty and attachment, and even pleading the ties of gratitude and conscience, they pour in their false accusations, and petition for leave to persecute.—It is an old slander, that "Jerusalem is a rebellious and bad city," and that the prosperity of the church would be injurious to kings and provinces: for "the Accuser of the brethren" knows how prevalent such considerations are with the princes of this world. Yet nothing can be more false: for true godliness teaches us to honor and obey the king; to "submit to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake;" to pay tribute, and "to render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's;" to be upright, peaceable, and blameless; and even to fulfil the oath or engagement which we have entered into to our own hurt: it admits of only a single exception; namely, where the command of God requires one thing, and the law of the land another, we must "obey God rather than man," and patiently submit to the consequences.—But it must be allowed, that ambitious and turbulent men have often disgraced the cause of God, by their usurpations, seditions, rebellions, treacheries, and perjuries: real Christians also have been seduced into inconsistent practices: and "oppression," which "maketh a wise man mad," has sometimes excited them to use unwarranted weapons. A few instances of this kind, standing on record, while the blameless lives and patient sufferings of thousands are unnoticed and forgotten, serve through revolving ages as a pretext, by which malignant enmity misleads worldly policy. All who love the gospel, should therefore walk circumspectly, avoiding all appearance of evil, especially in this particular, lest the church of God and posterity should suffer through their misconduct: for the whole body will be condemned without a hearing, if only a few individuals act improperly. (Note, Rom. 13:1,2.)—Indeed we cannot behave so quietly, and endeavor to serve God and to promote religion so unexceptionably, but our endeavors will be ascribed to ambition or avarice, and we shall be suspected of harboring the basest intentions. For kings and princes are seldom able to discover the truth, in such causes, even when disposed to inquire after it. Surrounded with flatterers and interested dependents, they must see with other men's eyes, and receive every information, concerning those whom their courtiers dislike, with a false coloring: and as they are too generally careless about religion, if not prejudiced against it, Satan and his emissaries seldom find much difficulty, in using them as the tools of their persecuting enmity. These considerations should teach us to count our cost; that we may be prepared for all events, and not be too easily discouraged or made remiss, as we are apt to be, upon every appearance of opposition: they should excite our gratitude for our peculiar privileges in this favored land, and teach us to place our dependance on that God, who has all hearts in his hands, and not on the mutable decrees of princes and senates. We should also be in haste to seize on every opportunity of doing good; even as the adversaries of the church do in their mischievous devices; for, as we receive all from our wise, gracious, and righteous God; it is not meet that we should quietly witness his dishonor, or neglect any method by which we may glorify his name, and promote his cause in the world.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1, 2. A great part of the book of Haggai, and the former part of Zechariah, refer to the events here recorded, and the reader will find it worth while to compare them with the history.—The Jews resumed their work about fourteen years after the first opposition, given to them by the Samaritans; but within two or three years after they had been compelled to desist entirely from it. In the mean time they had rebuilt their own houses, without being in the least molested. It may be supposed that they had an altar and tabernacle, and kept up their stated worship; but they were persuaded, that it was not yet time to build the temple. For this neglect the Lord corrected them, and reproved them by the prophets, who came to "prophesy even unto them," or rather "against them." Their remonstrances excited the rulers and the people to resume the work; and their subsequent encouraging prophecies greatly helped them in accomplishing it. (Notes, Hag. 1: Zech. 3:1—7. 4:4—10.)

V. 3. It is probable, that the governors of Samaria had been changed, on the accesion of Darius, for men of greater temper and impartiality. The "companions," here mentioned with the governors, seem to have been some of the chief persons of the nation, who formed the council. Excited, however, by the envy and jealousy of the Samaritans, they interfered, as soon as the Jews resumed the building of the temple.—This wall.] The wall about the temple seems to be meant. (Notes, Neh. 1:3. 2:12—16. 4:1—3. Dan. 9:25—27.)

V. 4. Then, &c.] It is uncertain whether these are the words of the governors of Samaria inquiring of the Jews the names of their rulers, who presided over the work; (10) or those of the workmen referring the inquirers to Zerubbabel and Jeshua, for information.—Ezra may fairly be supposed to have inserted the words of the record without alteration: so that the first person plural neither proves that he was then at Jerusalem; nor yet that he was not the writer of the history as some learned men have argued.

V. 5. (Marg. Ref.) The Lord so watched over his people, that the Samaritans, though full of enmity, were restrained from using violence to obstruct the work: and he gave them so many encouragements, in his providence and by his word, that they were not terrified from proceeding; till at length the matter having been referred to Darius, a favorable answer was obtained. (Notes, Hag. 2:3—19. Zech. 1:12—21.)

V. 6—17. It is probable, that this epistle likewise was copied from the public records, and interpreted into the Chaldee language: but it forms an entire contrast to the malevolent, slanderous, and disingenuous letter of the foregoing chapter. (Notes, 4:10—16.) It fairly stated facts to the king; and the writers merely desired to know his pleasure, after proper search had been made. The ingenuous account also, which the Jews gave of their nation, and the cause of the calamities that had befallen them, (which Tatnai and his associates faithfully stated to Darius,) is worthy of observation and of imitation.

Sheshbazzar, &c. (16) Hence it is evident, that Zerubbabel and Sheshbazzar are only two names of the same person. (Notes, 1:7—11. Zech. 4:4—10.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The enemies of the church are active, powerful, and malicious, and alas, its friends too often dispirited and negligent: yet the Lord will not suffer his cause to be run down, but will raise up instruments to revive and carry on his work.—It especially belongs to the office of the ministers of God to warn, exhort, encourage, and direct all orders in society to attend to their several duties: when this is properly performed, it will be found the most effectual means of forwarding reformation, and the power of godliness: and humble and pious men, in the most exalted stations, will think themselves helped, by the faithful labors and animated remonstrances of those, who really declare to them the word of God.—While professed Christians are satisfied with forms, and attentive mainly to their secular interests and accommodations, opposition may seem to be slain: but when they bestir themselves to do the work and seek the glory of God, it will soon be found that it was not dead, but merely asleep. Nothing, however, can harm those whom the Lord protects, or cause the work of those to cease whom he employs. He finds other employment for some opposers, he restrains others by the moderation of their superiors: some are removed by death, or by revolutions in governments; and others are softened or changed; as it seems good to him, "who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will."—There are men who have no true religion, yet are possessed of equity, candor, and generosity: and these qualities entitle them to our respect, though they will not justify them in the sight of God.—A fair statement of facts forms the honest man's best method of pleading a good cause.—The servants of the God of heaven need not, and must not, be ashamed of so great and good a Master; and it seems at first sight strange, that they should ever be tempted to so preposterous a crime.—Those religious peculiarities, which ignorant slanderers deem novel or singular, may boast an antiquity beyond all other sentiments or observances in the world; and have been maintained by the wisest, greatest, and most excellent men who ever lived upon earth.--While we continue in this world, we shall always have to confess, that our sins have provoked the God of heaven unto wrath; and that all our sufferings spring from this source, and all our comforts from his unmerited mercy.--We ought fully to acknowledge the favors which we have received from man; but should generally be silent as to the ill-treatment that we have met with. Even when we are exposed to censure, whilst the blame belongs to others; except the honor of God and the gospel requires it, it is seldom useful to vindicate ourselves.--The faithful worshippers of God are generally traduced, before they are persecuted: yet their cause demands nothing more than an impartial hearing in the palace that is in the province of the Medes, a roll, and therein was a record thus written:

3 In [b] the first year of Cyrus the king, the same Cyrus the king made a decree concerning the house of God at Jerusalem; Let the house be builded, [c] the place where they offered sacrifices, and let the foundations thereof be strongly laid; [d] the height thereof threescore cubits, and the breadth thereof threescore cubits;

4 With [e] three rows of great stones, and a row of new timber: and let [f] the expenses be given out of the king's house:

5 And also let [g] the golden and silver vessels of the house of God, [h] which Nebuchadnezzar took forth out of the temple which is at Jerusalem, and brought unto Babylon, be restored, and * brought again unto the temple which is at Jerusalem, every one to his place, and place them in the house of God.

6 Now therefore, [i] Tatnai, governor beyond the river, Shethar-boznai, and [†] your companions the Apharsachites, which are beyond the river, [k] be ye far from thence:

7 Let the work of this house of God alone; let the governor of the Jews, and the elders of the Jews build this house of God in his place.

8 Moreover [‡] I make a decree what ye shall do to the elders of these Jews, for the building of this house of God; that of [l] the king's goods even of the tribute beyond the river, forthwith expenses be given unto these men, that they be not [§] hindered.

9 And that which they have need of, both [m] young bullocks, and rams, and [n] lambs, for the burnt-offerings of the God of heaven, [o] wheat, [p] salt, wine, and oil, according to the appointment of the priests which are at Jerusalem, let it be given them day by day without fail:

10 That they may offer sacrifices of [‖] sweet savors unto the God of heaven, and [q] pray for the life of the king, and of his sons.

11 Also I have made a decree, that [r] whosoever shall alter this word, let [s] timber be pulled down from his house, and being set up, let him be [¶] hanged thereon; and let [t] his house be made a dunghill for this.

12 And the God, that hath [u] caused his name to dwell there, [x] destroy all kings and people that shall put to their hand, to alter and to destroy this house of God which is at Jerusalem. [y] I Darius have made a decree; let it be done with [z] speed.

to obtain a favorable decision; and many princes have persecuted more from misinformation and slanderous misrepresentation, than from malice.

NOTES.

Chap. VI. V. 1, 2. The decree of Cyrus in favor of the Jews had been a matter of great notoriety, and not more than sixteen years had elapsed since it had been granted: but in the changes which had taken place, and the multiplicity of affairs which occurred continually in the government of so vast an empire, it is probable that its purport had been forgotten. When, however, it could not be found at Babylon, Darius, unwilling to decide in this cause, without clear evidence, ordered it to be searched for at Achmetha, afterwards called Ecbatana, the chief city of Media; and there it was at length found, having probably been laid up in that city by Cyrus's orders.

V. 3. (Marg. Ref.) Some suppose that Cyrus did not allow the Jews to build the porch of the temple more than sixty cubits high, lest they should fortify it as a citadel; and that the sixty cubits in breadth included the chambers on each side the temple. Perhaps he permitted them to build the temple itself sixty cubits high and sixty wide, as well as sixty long; but they chose to build it of the same dimensions as their former temple: for it is generally agreed, that thus it was at last builded; and it is clearly proved, that the porch was raised to the same height. (Notes, 1 Kings 6:3,4. 2 Chr. 3:3,4.)

V. 4. Expenses, &c.] It is likely that the Jews had been deprived of this advantage, by the counsellors who were hired against them. (Notes, 3:7. 4:4—6.)

V. 5. Marg. Ref.—Notes, 1:1—4,7—11.

V. 6—12. Darius, in order to ingratiate himself with his subjects, shewed respect to the memory of Cyrus in every thing; and this might induce him to be more favorable to the Jews, when the decree of Cyrus was produced. But he seems to have been deeply convinced, that the God o the Jews was the God of heaven, who ought to be worshipped according to the law of Moses. His steady intention that sacrifices should be offered, at his expense, at Jerusalem, "of sweet savors to the God of heaven;" that the people of God "might pray for him and his sons;" and the expression, "the God, that hath caused his name to dwell there," (12) shew, that he had been instructed in companions, according to that which Darius the king had sent, [b] so they did speedily.

14 And [c] the elders of the Jews builded, and they prospered [d] through the prophesying of Haggai the prophet, and Zechariah the son of Iddo: and they builded, and [e] finished it, [f] according to the commandment of the God of Israel, and according to the *commandment of [g] Cyrus, and Darius, and [h] Artaxerxes king of Persia.

B. C. 515. 15 And this house was finished on the third day of the month [i] Adar, which was in the sixth year of the reign of Darius the king.

16 And [k] the children of Israel, the priests, and the Levites, and the rest of the †children of the captivity, kept [l] the dedication of this house of God [m] with joy, 17 And [n] offered at the dedication of this house of God, an hundred bullocks, two hundred rams, four hundred lambs; and for a [o] sin-offering for all Israel, twelve he-goats, [p] according to the number of the tribes of Israel.

18 And they set [q] the priests in their divisions, and the Levites in their courses, for the service of God which is at Jerusalem; ‡as it is written in the book of Moses.

19 And [r] the children of the captivity [s] kept the passover, upon the fourteenth day of the first month.

several important truths of genuine religion, and had a conviction of his dependence upon God, and entertained high and honorable thoughts of him, and that he regarded the prayers of his worshippers, as efficacious. (Marg. Ref.) The account indeed given of this transaction by the apocryphal Esdras is absurd, and inconsistent with facts; for Zerubbabel had been long at Jerusalem, before Darius granted this decree. (1 Esdras 4:13—63. 5:) But probably some pious Jews had access to the king, who had so explained the matter, as to give him these favorable sentiments, and to dispose him to the service assigned him by Providence. He thought that the continuance of his life and the prosperity of his family, might be secured by the prayers of the Jews: but he seems not to have considered his future and unspeakably more important interests; and it does not appear, that his convictions had any abiding effect upon his own mind or conduct.—Knowing also the envy and malice of the adversaries of the Jews, Darius denounced a most dreadful punishment against those who should any more molest them: and he concluded his decree, with a most remarkable, and almost prophetical, execration against all kings and people, who should attempt to alter or destroy the temple, after it was built. (Marg. Ref. x.—Note, Zech. 14:1—3.) Thus the Samaritans, by opposing the Jews, most effectually served their interests; their governors, perceiving the king's inclinations, zealously concurred; and so the work was speedily completed.

V. 13—15. If we allow a year for the message of Tatnai to the court of Darius, the search made among the records, and all delays and obstructions: for the granting of the decree, and its publication in Judea; it will appear, that it was published just seventy years after the destruction of the temple by the Chaldeans.—Zechariah, who prophesied at this time, mentions, that the people had kept annual fasts for the ruin of the city and temple, during seventy years; (Notes, Zech. 7:1—7.) and this absolutely fixes these events to the time of Darius Hystaspes; for no other Darius reigned in Persia till many years afterwards.—The historian inserts the name of Artaxerxes with those of Cyrus and Darius, as concurring in this work: (14) for though the temple was built before Artaxerxes came to the throne; yet probably it received great accessions of splendor and convenience, under the government of Ezra and Nehemiah, whom he patronized. (Notes, 7:1—5. Neh. 1:1.)—The temple was finished in rather more than four years after the Jews returned to the work, when excited to it by Haggai and Zechariah; (Note, 5:1,2.) in something more than two years after the decree of Darius had been published; and in about twenty years after the Jews returned from captivity. Cyrus reigned seven years; Cambyses, or Ahasuerus, seven; Artaxerxes, or Smerdis, one; and it was finished in the sixth of Darius. (Notes, 3:8—11. 4:4—6,17—24.)

Through the prophesying, &c. (14) ‘“Haggai ‘the prophet, and Zechariah” ... directed and en‘couraged them in their work; representing to ‘them, it is likely, the wonderful goodness of God, ‘who had inclined the heart of the king of Persia ‘to be so highly favorable to them.’ Bp. Patrick.

V. 16, 17. (Notes, Num. 7:1—14. 1 Kings 8: 63—66.) The tribes of Judah and Benjamin, with the priests and Levites, which had constituted the kingdom of Judah, formed also the bulk of the people after the captivity. But numbers from the other tribes had been incorporated with them in the reign of Rehoboam, and afterwards; and many returned with them from Babylon, probably some of all the other tribes. As the nation sprang from the twelve sons of Jacob, and some of the descendants of each remained; they were still considered as consisting of twelve tribes, and called “the children of Israel,” and a sin-offering was offered up for each of them. Doubtless the same reference to the twelve tribes took place in respect of the shew-bread, and the writing of their names on the high priest's garments and breastplate, as when they had been united under one government. (Marg. Ref. n, o.)

V. 18. Moses had given laws, concerning the ministry of the priests and Levites, with reference to the place which God would choose to place his name there; and subsequent events had proved Jerusalem to be that chosen place; but the courses

V. 19—21. It is probable, that the Jews who returned from their captivity had observed the passover, before the temple was finished: but not in so regular and solemn a manner, as at this time. V. 22. Of Assyria, &c.] Darius, reigning over the country of Assyria, is here called "the king of Assyria;" though the Persian monarchy had succeeded to the monarchies both of Assyria and Babylon.—The pious acknowledgment of God in all these transactions, as influencing the king to be kind to the Jews, and as thus making them joyful, is highly rational; though it has now almost sunk into disuse, even among professed Christians! (Notes, 7:27,28. 2 Kings 5:1. Prov. 21:1.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

Nothing but impartial and diligent investigation can give truth and innocence a decided advantage against lies, malice, and perjury: and much injustice may be committed merely through the indolence and inattention of magistrates.—Enmity or rapacity often intercepts the favors, which were intended for the people of God: but when his plan requires the interposition of princes, he can easily dispose them to use all diligence, to exert their authority, and to expend their treasures, in supporting his cause; and, for a time, these things have often been done by those, who would not give him their hearts, and never became his true worshippers! (Note, 2 Cor. 8:1—5.)—Did kings know their true interests, even in this world, they would support the worship of God, and give liberty and protection to his people; that acceptable services might be rendered to his name throughout their dominions, and that many prayers, might be daily offered up for them. We ought indeed to "pray for kings, and all in authority," whatever be their character and conduct; yet we are very apt to be remiss and formal in this service, till encouragement enlivens our desires and expectations: but when princes decidedly favor the cause of truth and righteousness, the hearts of pious Christians are enlarged with hopes, and they pray for them with greater earnestness. Their lives are then looked upon as a public advantage; and their persons, families, and undertakings, as well as their immortal souls, are daily recommended to the favor and blessing of the Almighty, by those "effectual fervent prayers of righteous men which avail much."—Such as interrupt and injure the worshippers of God, when protected by the civil government, are desperate rebels both against God and the king: and even tolerating laws will be insufficient for the protection of the harmless servants of God, if the executive power do not vigorously interpose, to punish such as illegally assault them. But the protection of God can alone be entirely depended on; and he will at length awfully destroy those persecutors who attempt to destroy his people, however powerful or numerous they may be.

V. 13—22.

When the Lord turns the hearts of princes, to strengthen the hands of his servants in their work; inveterate enemies will be overawed; indifferent persons will become helpers; the commandment of the king will be regulated by the commandment of God; and good designs, which had been long interrupted, will be speedily completed.—The revival of public ordinances, where they had been obstructed, should excite our rejoicing, because honor is thus ascribed to the Lord, and benefit accrues to the souls of men. Nor can the consideration of former sorrow, or of present meanness and poverty, mar the believer's joy in communion with his gracious God and Father.—When sinners are redeemed from the bondage of Satan, and separate themselves from the filthiness of their wicked connexions and practices; when they humbly seek the Lord, depending by faith on the atonement of the great Redeemer, attending on his ordinances, and observing his commandments, according to the duty of their place; they are children of captivity, who are set at liberty: and they shall be made joyful by his salvation; they shall be feasted at his table, and enjoy the light of his countenance, and he will be glorified in them, and rejoice over them to do them good for ever.—As nothing contributes more to the conversion of sinners, and to the purity and prosperity of the church, than the holiness and faithfulness of ministers; let us all unite in daily prayers to the Giver of every good and perfect gift, that all those who bear that sacred character may live and preach 'according to his holy word, 'and rightly and duly administer his holy sacra-'ments.'

CHAP. VII. V. 1—5. Artaxerxes, here men

6 This Ezra went up from Babylon; and he was [i] a ready [k] scribe in [l] the law of Moses, which the LORD God of Israel had given: and the king [m] granted him all his request, [n] according to the hand of the LORD his God upon him.

7 And there went up some of [o] the hildren of Israel, and of the priests, and [p] the Levites, and the [q] singers, and [r] the porters, and the [s] Nethinims, unto Jerusalem, in the seventh year of [t] Artaxerxes the king.

8 And he came to Jerusalem in the fifth month, which was in the seventh year of the king.

9 For upon the first day of the first month * began he to go up from Babylon, and on the first day of the fifth month came he to Jerusalem, [u] according to the good hand of his God upon him.

tioned, was evidently a different person from Darius. (6:14.) Xerxes, the son and successor of Darius, cannot be intended: for he reigned only twenty-one years; but Nehemiah, who was contemporary with Ezra, mentions the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes. (Neh. 5:14.) Artaxerxes Longimanus, the son and successor of Xerxes, must therefore be meant: and the seventh year of his reign was no less than seventy-nine years after the proclamation of Cyrus. The temple had been finished, and its worship restored within about twenty years: and nothing very memorable occurred during the subsequent fifty-nine or sixty years.—In all probability Zerubbabel, Jeshua, Haggai, and Zechariah were dead before this time: and the civil and ecclesiastical state of the Jews remained very unsettled, until this commission was granted to Ezra. (Note, Dan. 9:25—27.) Ezra was the son, that is, the descendant, of Seraiah, who had been dead above one hundred and thirty years. (2 Kings 25:18,21.) Many other persons are omitted in this abbreviated genealogy. (Marg. Ref.—Note, 1 Chr. 6:4—15.)

V. 6—10. Ezra had no doubt been educated to sacred learning, and had made great proficiency in it. Having, therefore, laid aside other employments and studies, and taking great delight in the scriptures; and having an ardent zeal for the honor of God, and an earnest desire of being useful to his people: he applied himself with great assiduity to obtain the suitable qualifications. He "gave himself wholly thereunto," and was careful to do, as well as to teach others, the statutes and judgments of God. (Notes, Deut. 33:10. 2 Chr. 17:7—9. 30:21,22, v. 22. Neh. 8:1—8. Mal. 2:4—9.) Thus he became very eminent, and waited for an opportunity of rendering important service to his people; employing himself, probably, in the mean time, in instructing the Jews at Babylon, as circumstances allowed: and, being a man of learning, ingenuity, and reputation, the king became acquainted with him; so that Ezra requested and obtained from him a commission to go up to Jerusalem, that he might regulate all things which related to the worship of the God of heaven.—The language used on this subject is well deserving of our most serious attention. Every thing is ascribed to God, for his is "the kingdom, and the power, and the glory for ever:" yet the agency of instruments and second causes is properly noticed. 'God 'was so favorable to him, as to incline the king 'to give a gracious answer to his petition.' Bp. Patrick. (Note, 27,28.)—The word scribe here used, does not merely signify one who wrote out copies of the law, but rather an interpreter of the law. The scribes mentioned in the New Testament, professed to be interpreters of the law; but they in general "made it void by their traditions." (Notes, Jer. 8:8,9. Matt. 13:51,52. 15:1—14.)—Many learned men are of opinion, and indeed with good reason, that Artaxerxes was the Ahasuerus, who soon after this married Esther; and that this commission, as well as that of Nehemiah, was obtained through her influence. (Note, Neh. 2:5,6.)—Of the priests, &c (7) Notes, 8:1—20.—He came to Jerusalem, &c. (8) Note, 8:21—23.

V. 11, 12. Marg. Ref.—King of kings. (12) The kings of Persia had many kings tributary to them; but this title seems to savor of ostentation, as if they had authority over all other kings. (Notes, 1 Kings 20:1. Is. 10:8—11. Dan. 2:37.)—The original letter is here inserted in the Chaldee language.

V. 13. The Jews, who had not taken the benefit of the proclamation of Cyrus, seem afterward to have been restrained from going to Jerusalem, till this decree of Artaxerxes again allowed them that liberty. (Note, 1:1—4.)

V. 14. Seven, &c.] Seven princes of Persia having conspired against and slain the usurp-

20 And whatsoever more shall be needful for the house of thy God, which thou shalt have occasion to bestow, [y] bestow it out of the king's treasure-house.

21 And I, even [z] Artaxerxes the king, do make a decree to all the treasurers which are [a] beyond the river, that whatsoever [b] Ezra the priest, the scribe of the law of the God of heaven, shall require of you, it be done speedily.

23 † Whatsoever is commanded by the God of heaven, let it be diligently done for the house of the God of heaven: for [e] why should there be wrath against the realm of the king and his sons?

24 Also we certify you, that [f] touching any of the priests and Levites, singers, porters, Nethinims, or ministers of this house of God, it shall not be lawful to impose toll, tribute, or custom, upon them.

25 And thou Ezra, after [g] the wisdom of thy God that is in thine hand, [h] set magistrates and judges, which may judge all the people that are [i] beyond the river, all such as know the laws of thy God; and [k] teach ye them that know them not.

26 And [l] whosoever will not do [m] the law of thy God, and the law of the king, let judgment be executed speedily upon him, [n] whether it be unto death, or to ‡ banishment, or to confiscation of goods, or to imprisonment.

er Smerdis, and thus made way for the family of Darius which afterwards filled the throne; the Persian kings ever after had seven chief princes as their counsellors, who possessed peculiar privileges, and joined with them in all public transactions. (Note, Esth. 1:13,14.) 'By this com-'mission he gave him authority to make inqui-'sition in Judea, whether every thing there was 'done conformably to the law of Moses. That 'is, he granted to the Jewish nation ... a liberty 'to live by their own laws, and to judge all 'causes according to them.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 15, 16. (Marg. Ref.) The king and his counsellors set the example to the people, of giving gold and silver on this occasion.—Canst find, &c. (16) That is, all the money, which Ezra could obtain by the voluntary contributions of the people, whether Jews or Babylonians. (1:4—6.)

V. 17, 18. (Marg. Ref.) It is remarkable, that a heathen prince should lay no other restriction on Ezra and his brethren, in disposing of the treasures which they collected, except that they should be employed, "after the will of their God." The whole commission implied a chartered right to the Jews of living according to their own laws.

V. 19—22. (Note, 6:6—12.) 'This was a won-'derful large concession, that he should have 'whatsoever he desired: and that they should not 'make him attend upon them, and wait long for 'it, but furnish him immediately.' Bp. Patrick. —Salt. (22) As salt was offered with every sacrifice, Artaxerxes did not limit the quantity to be supplied, lest any of the stated sacrifices should be omitted.

For they express an ' 'exceeding great sense of God, and of his ' 'supreme authority, and the regard that is ' 'due from the greatest kings and potentates, ' 'to his most sacred commands.' The like is 'not easy to be found any where.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 24—26. The king likewise exempted all employed about the worship of God, from paying any kind of tax; and as the Jews were far from affluent at that time, this was a very seasonable encouragement. He also authorized Ezra, as governor over the Jews who lived west of the Euphrates, to constitute magistrates under him, as he saw good. He allowed him to provide for the instruction of the people in the law of God, and even to proselyte the Gentiles; and he empowered him to punish all who proved refractory, according to their crimes.—David, Jehoshaphat, or Hezekiah could scarcely have done more for the Jews, than this heathen prince did: except as their examples, exhortations, and prayers would have concurred, to render these external helps and regulations effectual.

V. 27, 28. This pious scribe, instead of expatiating in the praises of his patron, or boasting of his own services, took occasion to bless God for "putting such a thing in the king's heart:" (Marg. Ref. p, q:) and for all the assistance and favor shewn him, by the king and his counsellors! (Note, 6:22.)—Whatever external decorations might be at this time added to the temple; the provision made for the orderly conducting of its sacred worship tended most effectually "to beautify it."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

When the Lord removes some useful instruments, he raises up others to fill their places.—Those, who desire to be "scribes well instructed for the kingdom of God," must lay aside all inconsistent pursuits and studies, and have their hearts purified from sinful passions, weaned from earthly affections, and filled with zeal for the glory of God, and love to the souls of men. They must "prepare their hearts" to seek the word of the Lord; that they may first understand it, then practise it, and afterwards teach it to others. In these sacred studies they should be diligent and unwearied; and meditation, prayer, and a spiritual mind will render them delightful. Thus they will become "able ministers of the New Testament," "men of God, throughly furnished for every good work," ready scribes, apt to teach, bringing forth out of their treasures things new and old: and, beginning with faithfulness and diligence in a narrow circle, they may in due time expect, "according to the good hand of God upon them," to be favored with more extensive opportunities of usefulness.—But knowledge, even of the sacred scriptures, except it be reduced to practice, and communicated to others, will become useless and worthless.

V. 11—28.

The servants of God cannot vary from their rules at the instance of the greatest princes, or "teach for doctrines the commandments of men:" but they may want the countenance and external assistance of rulers, in order that they may employ their gifts, and perform their duty, without molestation and to greater advantage. And when kings will grant them protection, intrust them with authority, and bear the expenses of their useful designs; and then leave them to conduct every thing by the rule of the word of God, and according to his will, as it appears to them and their brethren; they may without hesitation avail themselves of such assistance: nay, they may properly petition for it, when there appears a prospect of success. (Note, 2 Chr. 30:12.) But in whatever way great and effectual doors are opened to them, they should regard men only as instruments; and ascribe it to the power and goodness of God, if princes grant their requests; bless his name for putting such a thing in their hearts; and receive a commission from man merely as an external opportunity of executing a higher commission from God, according to his instructions, and under his protection.—The liberality of heathen kings, in beautifying the house of God, and supporting the expense of his worship, reproached the conduct of many kings of Judah, and of all that reigned in Israel; and it will rise up in judgment, and condemn the avarice of many nominal Christians, who refuse to employ their superfluous treasures in supporting the worship of God, and propagating the gospel in the world.—Unconverted men may perceive, that "whatsoever is commanded by the God of heaven," should be diligently done; and that the neglect of his worship will bring wrath upon kingdoms, and upon the persons and families of princes. But divine faith alone, as working by love and gratitude, is capable of producing unreserved, persevering, and delightful obedience—The exorbitant and pernicious exemptions, which ambitious ecclesiastics once claimed, have rendered magistrates reasonably jealous in this matter: but when ministers are poor and diligent, there would be a great propriety in favoring them with such exemptions, as consist with the welfare of society, and leave them to attend upon their work without embarrassing cares and distresses.—The wisdom, which God communicates through his word, is peculiarly useful in the choice of magistrates; that they may be indeed "a terror to evil-doers, and a protection to those who do well." It belongs to civil governors to enact laws, and to proportion punishments to offences for the welfare of the community, the suppression of immorality, and the encouragement of those who endeavor to obey God and the king. And when wise and just laws are enacted, and impartially executed, it should animate us to proceed in our proper work with redoubled diligence and alacrity, in full confidence that "the good hand of our God will be upon us," and prosper our attempts. But the weapons of our warfare, as Christian ministers, are not carnal: faithful preaching, holy lives, fervent prayers, and patient suffering, are the means we must use, to teach the ways of God to those who know them not, and to bring increasing numbers into

NOTES.

Chap. VIII. V. 1—14. Doubtless Ezra took proper methods of making his commission known to his brethren, throughout their dispersions: but, though extraordinary favors were granted, and the city, temple, and land were now prepared for their reception, very few were willing to undertake the journey. Most of the Jews, who remained in those countries, were either settled to their minds, or were averse to labor and peril. They probably had synagogues, where they met for public worship and instructions; and they were sinfully indifferent about the temple and its service. (Note, 1:5,6.) But God, on this occasion also, raised up the spirits of a remnant to accompany his servant Ezra.—They are here numbered according to the chief of the fathers, to whose families they belonged. Some of the names of these families were mentioned before; as the descendants of those who stayed behind, seem to have taken this opportunity of following their brethren. (2:2—42.) Thus we read of "the last sons of Adonikam," as no more of that family remained in the land of their captivity. (Marg. Ref. o.) The males only are mentioned; so that the number including the women, was double, at least, what is here mentioned.

V. 15. Ahava seems to have been the name both of a town, and of a rivulet which ran into the Euphrates, near the town. The whole company must have lodged in tents, during the journey, as well as before they entered on it.—No Levites, who were not also priests, were found among them: for Ezra himself was a priest, and we read of two other priests who had joined them. (2) A considerable treasure had been given to the temple at Jerusalem, by a Gentile king and his nobles; and yet no Levites offered themselves to take the charge of it! (7:14—19.)

V. 16, 17. (Marg. Ref.) It is uncertain where Casiphia lay, or who Iddo the chief was. The Nethinims are called his brethren: and, if he were one of that company, no doubt he had been advanced, on account of his extraordinary qualifications or services. Some, however, suppose the word rendered "his brethren" to be a proper name; and that, translated Nethinims, to signify appointed. They therefore render the passage thus; "I told them what they should say to Iddo and Achio, who were constituted in the place Casiphia."—It may be supposed there was at Casiphia a seminary, for the education of priests, Levites, and Nethinims, over which Iddo presided: where they had the free exercise of their religion, and had so comfortable a support, that they were not inclined to remove. 'It is very probable they 'had their synagogues (as they had afterward in 'their dispersion,) or other places, where they met 'for religious worship. For we find the people 'resorting to Ezekiel in their captivity, and him 'preaching to them the word of God, in many 'places of his book. (Ez. 33:30, &c.) And Ezra 'in all likelihood was an instructer among them, 'as Joiarib and Elnathan also were, and Iddo to 'whom these were sent.' Bp. Patrick.—Iddo, by reason of his age, or his employment, was not desired to go, but to send proper persons for this service, which the men of understanding would duly explain to him. (16) It seems, Ezra knew that subordinate ministers especially were wanted for the service of the house of God, and was therefore the more earnest in this matter.

18 And [c] by the good hand of our God upon us, they brought us [d] a man of understanding, of the sons of [e] Mahli, the son of Levi, the son of Israel; and [f] Sherebiah, with his sons and his brethren, eighteen;

19 And [g] Hashabiah, and with him Jeshaiah of the sons of [h] Merari, his brethren and their sons, twenty;

20 Also of the [i] Nethinims, whom David and the princes had appointed for the service of the Levites, two hundred and twenty Nethinims: all of them were expressed by name.

21 ¶ Then [k] I proclaimed a fast there, at the river of Ahava, that we might [l] afflict ourselves before our God, [m] to seek of him a right way for us, and [n] for our little ones, and for all our substance.

22 For [o] I was ashamed to require of the king a band of soldiers and horsemen to help us against the enemy in the way: because we had spoken unto the king, saying, [p] The hand of our God is upon all them for good that seek him; but [q] his power and his wrath is against all them that forsake him.

23 So [r] we fasted, and [s] besought our God for this: [t] and he was entreated of us.

[Practical Observations.]

24 ¶ Then I separated twelve of the chief of the priests, [u] Sherebiah, Hashabiah, and ten of their brethren with them;

25 And [x] weighed unto them [y] the silver, and the gold, and the vessels, even the offering of the house of our God, which the king, and his counsellors, and his lords, and all Israel there present, had offered:

26 I even weighed unto their hand six hundred and fifty talents of silver, and silver vessels an hundred talents, and of gold an hundred talents;

27 Also twenty basons of gold, of a thousand drams; and two vessels of * fine copper, † precious as gold.

28 And I said unto them, [z] Ye are holy unto the LORD; [a] the vessels are holy also; and the silver and the gold are a free-will offering unto the LORD God of your fathers.

V. 18. 'God inclined their hearts to comply 'with his desire.' Bp. Patrick. Sherebiah, no doubt, was "the man of understanding" here meant; and the passage should be read, "A man of understanding ... even Sherebiah." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 20. The Gibeonites were appointed to the service of the Levites, in the time of Joshua: (Note, Josh. 9:27.) and some think, that others, (perhaps a remnant of the devoted Canaanites, or of those who were vowed to the Lord, by themselves or their parents, (Note, Lev. 27:2—8.) were added to them, or placed in rather a superior station, by David and his princes, and afterwards by Solomon; and that these were, strictly speaking, the Nethinim.

V. 21—23. Ezra had collected his company at Ahava, in order to enter upon a journey of several hundred miles, which they were nearly four months in completing. (Notes, 31. 7:6—10, v. 9.) It lay chiefly through the desert: and, as they were encumbered with families and possessions, they could make but slow progress, and a feeble defence in case of an assault. They carried large treasures with them, which would invite the attempts of the Arabian free-booters, and others who infested that neighborhood. (Note, 26,27.) In ordinary cases it would have been very proper, to require of the king a band of soldiers and horsemen for their defence, which no doubt would have been readily granted: but Ezra, in order to impress Artaxerxes with a proper sense of the power and perfections of JEHOVAH, had confidently declared to him, "that the hand of their God was upon all them for good that seek him, and that his power and wrath were against all them that forsook him." Being therefore afraid lest the king should not at once understand the distinction between using means, and confiding in them; and lest he should be led to question the power, faithfulness, and goodness of Israel's God, or the sincerity of Ezra's dependence on him; he determined to travel without a guard, except that of the Almighty, being ashamed to ask any other, after his former avowed confidence in him. Yet, lest former sins should provoke God to leave them unprotected; and in order the more solemnly and publicly to put the whole company under his gracious protection; he proclaimed and observed a fast, that they might "afflict themselves before God," in deep repentance and self-abasement. Thus humbling themselves before the Lord, and seeking his merciful forgiveness, they besought him to be the Guide and Guard of them, their families, their substance, and also of the consecrated treasures. Accordingly he was entreated of them, their enemies were restrained or disabled, and they arrived unmolested at Jerusalem.

V. 24. Sherebiah and Hashabiah, before-mentioned, (18,19.) were descendants of Merari, the son of Levi, and not of Kohath, Aaron's progenitor; and consequently they were not priests. Either, therefore, the persons specified in this verse were priests who bore the same names; or they were the above-mentioned eminent Levites, who on this occasion were joined in trust with ten priests, in the care of the sacred treasures. (30)

V. 26, 27. These treasures are computed to have been at least worth a hundred thousand pounds sterling, besides the sacred vessels, which were very valuable. The far greater part of this 29 [b] Watch ye, and keep them, [c] until ye weigh them before the chief of the priests and the Levites, and chief of the fathers of Israel, at Jerusalem, in the chambers of the house of the LORD.

30 So took the priests and the Levites the weight of the silver, and the gold, and the vessels, to bring them to Jerusalem unto [d] the house of our God.

31 ¶ Then we departed from [e] the river of Ahava, on the twelfth day of the first month, to go unto Jerusalem: and [f] the hand of our God was upon us, and he delivered us from the hand of the enemy, and of such as lay in wait by the way.

32 And [g] we came to Jerusalem, and abode there three days.

33 Now on the fourth day was the silver, and the gold, and the vessels [h] weighed in the house of our God, by the hand of [i] Meremoth the son of [k] Uriah the priest; and with him was Eleazar the son of Phinehas; and with them was [l] Jozabad the son of Jeshua, and Noadiah the son of [m] Binnui, Levites;

34 By number and by weight of every one: and all the weight was written at that time.

35 Also the children of those that had been carried away, which were come out of the captivity, [n] offered burnt-offerings unto the God of Israel, [o] twelve bullocks for all Israel, ninety and six rams, seventy and seven lambs, twelve he goats for a sin-offering: all this was a burnt-offering unto the LORD.

36 And they delivered [p] the king's commissions unto the king's [q] lieutenants, and to the governors on this side the river: and [r] they furthered the people, and the house of God.

As Ezra departed from Babylon, on the first day of the first month, (7:9.) and having sent to Casiphia to procure Levites and Nethinim, the company set off from Ahava on the twelfth day of the same month; it is evident that Casiphia was not far from Ahava.—It seems, Ezra was aware that there were enemies who lay in wait by the way, to assault, plunder, or destroy him and his company: yet he trusted in God to protect them, and they were accordingly delivered.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—23.

While love of the world, and fear of the cross, induce most men to neglect the salvation of the gospel; they, who obey the gracious call, stand recorded in the book of life, and will be honored by God himself.—When some of a family embrace the gospel, those who linger behind may probably follow; till sometimes, in answer to fervent prayers, and by means of zealous, affectionate, persevering endeavors, the very last are brought in.—Alas! that professed ministers of religion, who ought to take the lead in every good work, are generally so backward to labor, or venture, or suffer in the cause of God; and need to be stirred up by the example and exhortations even of their lay-brethren! But such as address them on these occasions should be chief men, or men of understanding and established character; lest they should be irritated, instead of being persuaded. They must not, however, be left to their negligence: and their superior brethren, having given them a good example, may send or speak to them, with more authority and effect than others can; and often those, who were before inattentive, will profit by meek and faithful admonitions.—When ministers for "the work of the house of our God" are raised up, who are men of piety and understanding, we should acknowledge "the good hand of our God upon us," and give him the praise; as we ought at all times to lift up our prayers for this blessing to his church.—It is an invariable rule, that "the hand of our God is upon all them for good, that seek him; but his power and wrath is against all them that forsake him:" and we ought to live in the habitual firm belief of this, and should not be ashamed, if called to it, to avow our confidence before the greatest monarchs upon earth: but we should be ashamed to act inconsistently with these professions, or even to appear distrustful of the Lord in the path of duty. On some occasions we ought to omit those precautions for personal safety, and refuse to make that provision for our families, which in other circumstances are very lawful; lest our weaker brethren, or inquirers, should be stumbled, and so our God should be dishonored. We have therefore great need to ask wisdom from him, that we may know how to use, or to refuse, lawful things, as expedient, or otherwise: and we shall be no losers by venturing, renouncing, or suffering for his sake; as "it is better to trust in the LORD, than to put confidence in princes," or in armed hosts.—We should "acknowledge him in all our ways;" but we may especially confide ourselves and our works into his hands, when we are simply endeavoring to serve

CHAP. IX.

Ezra, learning that many of the priests and people had married heathen wives, expresses great sorrow and consternation, 1—4. He prays, and makes confession of sin unto God, 5—15.

NOW when these things were done, [a] the princes came to me, saying, The people of Israel, and the priests, and the Levites, [b] have not separated themselves from the people of the lands, [c] doing according to their abominations, even [d] of the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Perizzites, the Jebusites, [e] the Ammonites, the [f] Moabites, the Egyptians, and the Amorites.

2 For they have [g] taken of their daughters for themselves, and for their sons: so that [h] the holy seed have [i] mingled themselves with the people of those lands: yea, [k] the hand of the princes and rulers hath been chief in this trespass.

3 And when I heard this thing, I [l] rent my garment and my mantle, and [m] plucked off the hair of my head and of my beard, and [n] sat down astonied.

the cause of true religion. Instead of anxiously seeking help from an arm of flesh, (to which we are all shamefully prone,) when unexpected difficulties or dangers obstruct our path, we should more earnestly and explicitly commit our way unto the Lord. In such circumstances, seasons appropriated to secret or social fasting and prayer, form the most effectual method that we can take: because they best prepare our own souls properly to receive the blessing, and most immediately lead us to seek the forgiveness and mortification of our sins; which are more formidable hindrances to our success, than mountains, rivers, seas, or armies of hostile invaders or assailants. Indeed few enterprises, good in themselves, finally fail of success, which are begun and conducted in this way. And when we thus humbly beseech the Lord, he will be entreated of us; and by his good hand upon us, we shall bring all our undertakings in due season to a happy termination.

V. 24—36.

They should be holy persons, who have the charge of holy things. Ministers are stewards of the most precious mysteries of God; and watch for the souls of men, every one of which is more valuable than all the world: and if any are wanting through their default, they will be required at their hands. The meanest of them, therefore, needs at least as much wisdom, vigilance, integrity, fidelity, and zeal, as the chief of those who carried the vessels of the Lord. And if any of us are intrusted with the gold and silver of the free-will offerings of our brethren; or of the princes and affluent persons of this world, for pious or charitable uses; we should "provide for things honest, not only in the sight of God, but also in the sight of men:" that we may be able, when required, to give a punctual account of the whole to those, by whom, or for whom, we have been employed. A clear conscience, and an evidently upright conduct, are both comfortable and reputable: yet our whole dependence for the acceptance of our persons and of all our services, must be rested on the merits and sacrifice of our great Surety: through him we must devote ourselves, and consecrate our services, to our reconciled God, and then walk before him in his commandments and ordinances, as we have opportunity and ability.—"When our ways please the LORD, he maketh even our enemies to be at peace with us:" and if he disposes a few of the great ones of the earth to favor his cause; numbers will afford their external assistance, not to please God, but the prince.—If preservation in peace and safety during our journeys on earth demand our tribute of grateful praise: what acclamations of gratitude shall we raise, when the Lord has conducted us safe through the perilous and wearisome pilgrimage of life, and through the gloomy vale of death, out of the reach of all our enemies, into the regions of eternal felicity!

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1, 2. After it was known that Ezra was come to Jerusalem, commissioned by the king of Persia, to be ruler over those countries, and especially to reform the state of religion among the Jews; some of the princes informed him concerning the gross misconduct of their brethren, which they had not been able to prevent. It seems there was still a remnant of the old inhabitants dwelling in the borders of the land: (Marg. Ref.) and the Jews, being poor and exposed, opened an intercourse with them, and with other neighboring nations; and intermarried with them, in violation of the law. This had always proved an introduction to idolatry: and their sin was the more aggravated, and threatened the worse consequences, because the priests, whose marriages had been carefully regulated by the law, (Notes, Lev. 21:7—15.) and the princes, to whom it belonged to enforce obedience to it, were ringleaders in the transgression; and thus, both encouraged others by their example, and deterred such as wished to enforce the law against the criminals. (Notes, 10:18—44. Ex. 34:11—17. Neh. 13:1—4,23—31. Mal. 2:10—12. 2 Cor. 6:14—18.) They had not indeed yet proceeded to direct idolatry; but they were in the direct way to it, and already chargeable with doing in some respects "according to the abomination of the Gentiles."

and was received with professed cordiality; when he saw the temple prepared, and the worship regularly conducted, with apparent piety; we may suppose, that he was joyful and thankful. But having been informed of these forbidden marriages, which threatened a speedy repetition of former crimes and judgments, he was affected with deep consternation and sorrow; and he expressed his concern for the honor of God and the interests of Israel, by the customary tokens, and even by such as were used to denote the greatest indignation, terror, or distress. (Marg. Ref.—2 Kings 22:19. Note, Josh. 7:6—9.) This seems to have been done publicly in some place of resort; and the matter being reported, many others became suitably affected, and trembled at the words of God, because of the transgression of Israel; (Note, Is. 66:1,2.) and were prepared to join in humiliation before him, and in effecting a reformation.—The Jews are here called, "Those that had been carried away;" which might remind them of the captivity from which they were lately returned, and which had been brought upon them by similar transgressions.—It is probable, that Ezra observed a profound silence for some time, which indicated that the confusion and distress of his mind were too big for utterance. (Notes, Neh. 1:4. Job 2:11—13.)

V. 5. (Marg. Ref. q, r.) It is probable that Ezra chose the time of the evening-sacrifice, to go from the place where he first shewed his alarm and sorrow; and that he went up to the house of God, (10:1.) because the priests at that hour, whilst the sacrifice was offering, burned incense in the temple, and the people met together in the courts of it to pray. (Note, Luke 1:8—10.)

V. 6. Ezra was not personally guilty in this matter: but he spake and acted, as the representative and the mouth of the whole people; being a member, and in some respects the head, of that body which had thus violated the covenant of God. (Notes, Dan. 9:3—20.) He came to establish the civil and ecclesiastical state of the nation, "according to the good hand of his God upon him;" and he was ashamed and blushed, when he considered the rebellious and ungrateful conduct of that people, whose cause he had to plead continually before the Lord. Indeed the former crimes of Israel were like an inundation, which, being swelled by their present transgressions, would flow even over their heads, and entirely overwhelm them: or they formed an enormous pile, which, increasing by continual accessions of presumptuous rebellion, reached even to the heavens, to call down the vengeance of God upon them. The people, it may be supposed, persuaded themselves, that as they were free from idolatry, and adhered to the worship at the temple, all was very well and commendable among them; that their deviations as to these marriages were excusable, if not justifiable by necessity or policy; and that on the whole they might expect the favor and protection of God. (Note, Rom. 7:9—12.) But the vehement language of this eminent man was well suited to give them a very different view of the case; and to convince them that they were abominable in the sight of God, and in danger of his severest vengeance: and it loudly called on them all, especially the criminals, to humble themselves before God in deep repentance.—Grown up unto the heavens.] 'This signifies ... the high presumption and insolence of their wickedness.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 7. (Marg. Ref.) As it is, &c.] Jerusalem and the temple had been rebuilt, and a remnant were returned from captivity: but the nation in general was in a dependent, impoverished, and abject state; in comparison with that prosperity which their fathers had enjoyed in the times of David and Solomon, and which they had forfeited by their sins: (Note, Neh. 9:36,37.) and the bulk of it yet remained in a state of captivity and dispersion.

V. 8. A remnant of the Jews had now occupied Jerusalem and Judea for nearly eighty years; having thus had a revival, for a comparatively little space from the state of national death, as it were, which had continued during the captivity: (Notes, Ez. 37:11—14.) and it might have been supposed, that the miseries of their ancestors would have effectually deterred them from imitating their crimes: yet in so short a time, they had made considerable progress in the very same path; and in case they proceeded in that way, a speedy period would be put to this reviving of their prosperity. (Notes, Ps. 85:1—8.)—"A nail given them in the LORD's holy place," seems to signify, that the rebuilding of the temple formed a sure ground of confidence in the Lord, whilst they adhered to his service, and rested all their hopes and dependence on him. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Is. 22:20—25.)

V. 9. Notes, 7:11—28.—A wall, &c.] The temple, being the pledge of God's presence among them, was as a wall, by which the Jews were effectually secured from their enemies; unless they provoked him to desert them. Jerusalem was not at this time surrounded with a wall. (Notes, Neh. 1:3. 2:12—16. 3: 4:1—3. Dan. 9:24—27.) 'The Hebrew word (גדר) ... doth not properly 'signify a wall, but a hedge or fence, such as were 'made for the folds of sheep. Whereby Ezra 'expresses (as Huetius well notes,) the singular 'care of God of them; who being "the Shepherd of 'Israel," had ... brought them back into their an-'cient folds, wherein he preserved them safe, even 'when they had no wall to defend them, under the 'powerful protection of the king of Persia.' *Bp. V. 10—12. (Marg. Ref.)—'What shall any 'one say for such a wretched people as this, ... 'who had no regard to their prophets, nor to Moses 'himself, who had charged them to have nothing 'to do with the people of Canaan? ... Can we ex-'pect less than utter destruction of this small rem-'nant, when, after all the punishments he hath in-'flicted upon us for our sins, and his ceasing to 'punish us, and rescuing us in this manner from 'our captivity, we return to those sins which are 'so odious to him, because so expressly against his 'commandments?' Bp. Patrick.—Nor seek their peace, &c. (12) The Israelites might seek the conversion of the heathen, or do them acts of common humanity: but they must not unite interests with them, nor seek their peace or prosperity in the land of Canaan, whilst they continued idolaters. (Note, Josh. 23:11—13, v. 13.)

V. 13, 14. Both the judgments and mercies, experienced by the people, aggravated the guilt of their transgressions; which would now speedily fill up their measure of iniquity, and bring final and total ruin upon them, except they took warning in time. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 15. Though the Jews had endured many and heavy sufferings, yet they had been punished less than they deserved; for they had broken their covenant, and merited utter ruin. (13. Note, Lam. 3:21—23.) Whatever therefore should hereafter befal them, the Lord would be righteous in his dealing with them: and if they were yet spared, it would be entirely the effect of his mercy.—Thus Ezra closed his address, without adding one petition to his humble confessions. He knew not what to say, to ask, or to do. He could say nothing to excuse his people; he was sure they could not stand in judgment before God. He dreaded the consequences; yet he had not given up all hopes. His own mind was affected, and his manner could scarcely fail to affect others: and by this abrupt conclusion, as one who was assured that the righteous Lord would do what was right, he referred the whole matter to him, to do what was good in his sight. (Notes, 10:1,2. Josh. 7:6—9. 2 Sam. 24:12—14.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

Where a profession of godliness is made by great numbers, in a way which appears satisfactory to those who behold it as at a distance; the eye of God often perceives, and careful investigation may frequently detect, very shameful practices: and those useful designs, which are undertaken with great pleasure and sanguine hopes, will seldom be completed without many anxious and painful sensations.—Those who deal in frivolous, slanderous, and malicious informations, are justly the objects of public execration: but when a pious regard to the honor of God, and a disinterested concern for the benefit of the community, induce men to give information of gross and flagrant abuses, to those who are authorized to repress them; they perform a most useful and honorable service: and even princes may glory in such an employment, though the criminals will generally hate and revile them for it. (Note, Gen. 37:2.) Men, who pride themselves in being free from gross iniquities, often venture into the very path which leads to the commission of them: and even the miseries of sinners in the ways of vice fail to deter the spectators from copying their examples.—If we would, as the servants of God, "a holy seed," devoted to him by solemn covenant, be preserved from the abominations of the wicked, we must separate from their society, and break off all connexions with them: and intermarriages, between his people and ungodly persons, have in all ages been a successful device of Satan, to prevail against the cause of truth and righteousness, and to produce apostacies, superstitions, idolatry, or impiety.—Too often, through the artifice of the enemy, they, who should warn or restrain others, sanction transgression by their own example, and by protecting the criminals from censure or punishment. Indeed formalists of every description make light of alliances or intimacies with those who are ungodly, and explain away the exhortation to "come out from among them and be separate:" but those who are best acquainted with the word of God, with the human heart, and with the history of the church, and who have the most affectionate regard for the souls of men, view the subject in another manner. They mourn over such transactions, and forebode the worst of consequences from them; and are constrained most solemnly to express their concern and consternation. But alas! the evils, which are allowed and pleaded for, by many who profess to be "the holy seed," may well excite our astonishment as well as deep regret: and we ought to shew our abhorrence of their abominations in the most earnest and decided manner. When this is done by those who are had in reputation for piety or wisdom, it will excite the attention of others, and cause them to tremble at the words of God, because of the transgression of the people: and this will produce greater watchfulness, lead to self-examination and humiliation, and subserve the purposes of reformation.—Silent grief and astonishment sometimes form the most expressive protestation against enormous crimes: and when men speak on such occasions, it may be more effectual to address themselves to God, than to the offenders.

V. 6—15.

Whatever may afflict our hearts, we must not yield to inactive despondency, but arise from our heaviness, to spread our sorrows before the Lord, with humble and reverent devotion.—In confessing the sins of churches, or nations, all who form a part of them should bear a share: for every individual has, one way or other, added his transgressions to the aggregate of guilt: and all are interested in the event, and stand related to such as have committed those crimes, from which they have been preserved.—We should endeavor to affect ourselves and others with the greatness and heinousness of our sins: for often, when we think little of our transgressions, they have grown up even to the heavens, and are ready to overwhelm us with the vengeance of the Almighty.—National guilt accumulates from age to age, whilst children copy the iniquities of their fathers. Hence spring all our miseries: yet the Lord "punishes us less than our iniquities deserve;" and no past or present sufferings will exempt us from greater in future, unless "we repent and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance."—Every respite, and every degree of former mercies and privileges, should be thankfully received: but they all say to us, "Sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee." Even the gospel and the ordinances of God, which are "a nail in his holy place," on which to suspend all our hopes and interests; and which are given us to lighten our eyes, and to deliver us from our bondage, and to be a reviving to our souls, will only aggravate the doom of those who rest in them, and go on in their sins.—In this world God afflicts sinners, yet spares them, that his goodness may lead them to repentance: he corrects, but he does not utterly forsake, his people: he extends mercy to them, by disposing others to be kind to them: yet his favor forms their best security and comfort. But "what shall we say," when judgments, mercies, warnings, and respites leave sinners hardened in impenitence? The case is dreadful, and it may be expected that the Lord will be angry with them, until they are consumed without remnant or escaping.—Indeed every penitent, reflecting upon his own conduct, and comparing it with his mercies, will be "ashamed and blush before God;" his mouth will be stopped, and he will not know what to say. The law is holy, just, and good; obedience would have been reasonable and profitable; his guilt is undeniable and inexcusable; the wrath of God is dreaded and deserved; he feels himself in the Lord's hands, without plea, or power to escape. "It is of his mercies that he is not consumed," and if he perish the Lord will be righteous: his only hope arises from a belief of abounding grace, and he casts himself before the Lord with this only plea, "God be merciful to me a sinner."—Even the believer, though he habitually "walks in newness of life," often breaks God's commandments, exposes himself to rebukes and chastisements; and must come ashamed, and confounded, and blushing before God, on account of his foolish and ungrateful conduct, and again adopting the publican's prayer. Indeed every individual in the whole church, has cause to wonder, that his ingratitude, perverseness, and folly have not wearied out the patience of God, and brought utter destruction upon him. What then must be the case of the ungodly world around us? However, though the true penitent has nothing to plead in his own behalf, the heavenly Advocate pleads most powerfully for him; and prevails in behalf of all those who unfeignedly condemn themselves, and cast themselves wholly upon the mercy of God, through his atoning blood.

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1. The exceedingly deep sorrow and consternation of so eminent a person as Ezra, who had come to Jerusalem, with so ample and favorable a commission from the king of Persia, and with such pious and beneficent purposes; with his prayer, and most humble confession of deep criminality, were no doubt speedily reported all over the city; and the high esteem generally entertained of his piety and wisdom, induced the people seriously to reflect upon their conduct, and its consequences: so that numbers, of their own accord, gathered around the governor, and united with him in lamentations and humiliation before God. And, the alarm becoming general, even the women and children joined the assembly in the court of the temple; probably fearing lest the wrath of God should immediately be poured out upon them.

V. 2. Shechaniah is not mentioned among those who were guilty: but his father and several of his relations are. (Note, 20—43, v. 26.) He spoke, however, as one of the offending community, though not personally criminal; and he would not be deterred from decisive measures by regard to his nearest relatives.—Probably he observed that Ezra was too desponding, and ready to conclude that reformation would be impracticable, where so many of the chief persons were concerned. (Notes, Num. 25:4—15.) But he perceived very favorable symptoms in the case. The people were generally convinced of their guilt and danger; and the most daring criminals would not venture to oppose the general opinion of the governor and the congregation. There "was therefore hope in Israel concerning this thing:" an effectual reform might be made; and then the Lord would turn from his fierce wrath against them, as "he delighted in mercy."

V. 3. (Marg. Ref.)—To put away, &c.] This is not any where expressly commanded in the law; yet the spirit of the precept seemed to require it. (Notes, 9:1—4. Ex. 34:11—17. Josh. 23:11—13, v. 13. Neh. 13:23—30.) The prohibition of marriages with idolaters was given to prevent temptations to idolatry: and retaining an idolatrous wife formed a continual temptation. Divorces were permitted to the Israelites, by the judicial law, to prevent worse consequences: but the seducing of a man to idolatry was the worst consequence imaginable. This measure would also tend to prevent the contracting of such marriages in future. 'That which was done 'contrary to the law of God, was looked upon as 'null, and therefore these were accounted no 'marriages; and their children ... were not to be 'a part of the family, but to be put away with 'their mothers. ... Being educated in superstition, 'they might corrupt other children.' Bp. Patrick. It is probable, however, that none were put away, but such as continued idolaters; and that they were provided for out of the estates of those who divorced them. It does not appear, whether the children were generally sent away with their mothers, or not: but doubtless such were provided for, as were not admitted into the congregation of the Lord. (Note, 10,11.) Under the New Testament, the marriages of believers with ungodly persons are evidently sinful, and of very bad consequence: yet when contracted they must not be dissolved. The partition-wall between Jews and Gentiles is broken down; such matters are determined by the municipal laws of every country; and divorces, except for adultery, are expressly disallowed. (Notes, Matt. 5:31,32. 19:3—9. Mark 10:2—12. 1 Cor. 7:10—16.)

V. 4, 5. Shechaniah's mind, being more composed than Ezra's, perceived that it was a favorable crisis for action: so that he exhorted him, instead of indulging grief and yielding to heartless dejection, to arise and exercise his authority, according to the commission of Artaxerxes; and assured him of the hearty assistance of himself and others in the arduous attempt. (Note, Josh. 7:10—12.) Thus encouraged, Ezra entertained hopes of remedying the evil, and immediately engaged all present, by a solemn oath, to concur in this design.—'The commission given 'to Ezra, supposing a full leave to the people to 'live according to the law, enabled him to gov'ern them by it, yea, to swear them to observe it; 'for he might do whatsoever he found necessary 'to keep them in obedience.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 6. He did eat, &c.] Some render the words "Until he came thither, he had neither eaten bread, nor drunk water." He had no heart to take food, till the prospect of reformation opened to him; but spent his time in fasting, weeping, and prayer.

V. 7, 8. Marg. Ref.—All his substance, &c. (8) That is, his estate should be confiscated, 9 ¶ Then all the men of Judah and Benjamin gathered themselves together unto Jerusalem within three days. It was [e] the ninth month, and the twentieth day of the month: and all the people sat in the street of the house of God, [f] trembling because of this matter, and for the * great rain.

10 And Ezra the priest stood up, and said unto them, Ye have transgressed, and have † taken strange wives, [g] to increase the trespass of Israel.

11 Now therefore [h] make confession unto the LORD God of your fathers, and [i] do his pleasure; and [k] separate yourselves from the people of the land, [l] and from the strange wives.

12 Then all the congregation answered and said with a loud voice, As thou hast said, [m] so must we do.

13 But [n] the people are many, and it is a time of much rain, and we are not able to stand without; neither is this a work of one day or two: for ‡ we are many that have transgressed in this thing.

14 Let now [o] our rulers of all the congregation stand, and let all them which have taken strange wives in our cities come at appointed times, and with them the elders of every city, and the judges thereof, until [p] the fierce wrath of our God § for this matter be turned from us.

15 Only Jonathan the son of Asahel and Jahaziah the son of Tikvah ‖ were employed about this matter: and [q] Meshullam and [r] Shabbethai the Levite helped them.

16 And the children of the captivity did so. And Ezra the priest, with certain chief of the fathers, after the house of their fathers, and all of them by their names, were separated, and sat down in the first day of the tenth month [s] to examine the matter.

17 And they made an end with all the men that had taken strange wives, by the first day of the first month. [B. C. 456.

18 ¶ And among [t] the sons of the priests there were found that had taken strange wives; namely, of the sons of [u] Jeshua, the son of Jozadak, and his brethren; [x] Maaseiah, and Eliezer, and Jarib, and Gedaliah.

and put among the sacred treasures, and he should be treated as a heathen, and denied the privileges of a Jew. (Marg.—Notes, Lev. 27: 28,29. Josh. 6:17—19.) Patrick.*—Doubtless, reasonable excuses would be admitted: and the punishment was only inflicted on the refractory, and those who shewed a determination to oppose the measure. Ezra was authorized to punish such persons more severely; (7:26.) but he was not disposed to put any one to death, if it could be avoided.

V. 9. For the great rain.] The periodical rains, common at that season, seem to have been more abundant than usual: and as no building could be large enough to contain the whole multitude; this providential circumstance added to their distress, and seemed an indication of the divine displeasure. (Note. Jer. 3:2,3.)

V. 10, 11. (Marg. Ref.) As Ezra mentions only the strange wives, and not their children, some think that the children were retained, and brought up in the Jewish religion.—'Though 'Shecaniah propounded the putting away the 'children also; (3) yet it may be thought that 'Ezra, to whom the matter was referred, mit-'igated the severity of it; because we do not 'read any thing of them, but only of the wives, 'when he came to order what should be done.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 12—14. The congregation at once declared their readiness to divorce their heathen wives, in all cases where it was determined to be their duty: but the difficulties of the business would require more consideration, than could be given them, in their present situation, and by a popular assembly. They therefore proposed, that the principal counsel or senate should convene at Jerusalem, who might summon before them the parties concerned, from every city, together with the judges and elders of their cities; and so deliberately investigate and decide upon every case; that the business might be settled effectually, and in an unexceptionable manner.—It would be needful to determine, whether the women had been proselyted, either before or after marriage; whether they had relapsed into idolatry, or shewn a propensity to do so; or whether they had given satisfactory evidences, that they had sincerely embraced the Jewish religion. These and many other similar questions must be resolved, before sentence was denounced; and this would take up much time. The proposal was therefore very reasonable: Ezra readily acceded to it, and thus the business was peaceably and happily terminated.

V. 15. Ezra and the chief persons in the nation, as forming a council, decided on the several cases brought before them: and on this ground some think, that the four persons here mentioned, and no more, opposed the measure. The words indeed may bear that sense: yet the more general opinion is, that these four men were appointed by the council, to bring the business before them in due form.

V. 16, 17. The cases, brought before the council, were either so many, or so complicated:

they would put away their wives; and being guilty, they offered [a] a ram of the flock for their trespass.

that, though they separated themselves from other employments, to attend on this exclusively, they were three months in finishing it. This took place just a year after Ezra left Babylon.

V. 18, 19. No doubt Jeshua died many years before this transaction: (Note, 7:1—5.) but his descendants had set a very pernicious example to the people. They, however, were the first to confess and forsake their sin, and also to present a trespass-offering on that account; 'which some 'think, all the rest made, after their example.' Bp. Patrick. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 44. Providence had so ordered it, that not many of the people had children by their heathen wives. Thus the separation was more easily effected: and at the same time, it was a token of the divine disapprobation of such marriages.—Perhaps these were the principal persons, who were criminal; for all circumstances combine to induce an opinion, that a far greater number were concerned, than those here expressed by name.—Ezra continued nearly twelve years after this in authority at Jerusalem, no doubt zealously laboring to promote a revival of true religion. And in many ways, he established the ecclesiastical state of the Jews: though he seems not to have been so well qualified, as his successor Nehemiah, to attend to the civil government, to defend the city and state against enemies and invaders, and to effect outward reformation by the authority of the magistrate. Accordingly he is introduced in the ensuing book, as well employed in his proper line, though superseded by Nehemiah in his civil authority. (Notes, 1 Sam. 12:23. Neh. 8:1—8.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

Genuine humiliation before God, and sorrow for sin, always produce "works meet for repentance." Yet they who are greatly affected with the view of the evil and aggravation of their own sins, or those of the community to which they belong, are in danger of being "swallowed up by over-much sorrow," and so discouraged from present duty. In this case the grounds of hope should be pointed out to them; and so rich is the mercy of God through the great Redeemer, that there is always encouragement for those who are willing to accept of his salvation: and when the most atrocious criminals humbly mourn on account of their sins, and tremble at his word, there is good reason to expect that they will obey his commands.—In order to affect others with godly sorrow and hatred of sin, or holy love and gratitude, we must ourselves be greatly affected: for evident earnestness in these important concerns is far more impressive upon the mind, by a kind of holy sympathy, than the most labored eloquence or reasoning. Indeed the effect of such earnestness frequently bears a proportion to the rank, reputation, piety, or wisdom of him who is thus affected: so that the silent grief and consternation, or the humble prayers and confessions, of one eminent person, may, by the blessing of God, excite serious alarms and inquiries among great multitudes. These are critical seasons, and call for decision in proposing and executing measures of extensive and durable usefulness. Yet vehement passions, in those to whom great concerns belong, are attended by considerable disadvantages; and far inferior persons may give seasonable advice, suggest suitable encouragement, or propose adequate assistance.—We cannot too solemnly engage ourselves and each other, to renounce all interests, connexions, or indulgences, which are contrary to the law of God. And when leading men set the example, and then propose the same things to others, many may be prevailed on by conviction, fear, or shame: and thus opposition will be prevented, or rendered ineffectual.—Excessive sorrow, terror, and self-abasement; and a great engagement of heart about the things of God and the eternal world, indispose us to animal recreation: so that fasting then becomes a natural expression of our feelings, as well as a suitable concomitant of our prayers and supplications.—Fervent affections should not be allowed to subside, till our most beloved sins have been renounced; and we should "know no man after the flesh," when a revival of pure religion is attempted (Note, 2 Cor. 5:16.)

V. 9—44.

That which must be done, should be set about without delay: they are not worthy of the privileges of God's people, who will not concur in promoting obedience to his commandments: and those deserve severe punishment from the civil magistrate, who oppose his authority, especially when he is doing his duty according to the oracles of God.—When the frowns of Providence unite with the terrors of an awakened conscience, to distress the trembling sinner, he becomes an object of deep compassion: and though no favor must be shewn to his sins, much tenderness should be exercised to his person.—The most effectual divorce from lucrative or beloved sins, is generally preceded by examination and deliberation: for that which is hastily resolved, seldom proves durable.—Cases, at first sight similar, upon mature investigation appear very different: and in correcting abuses, caution and compassion should unite with impartiality and decision; that there may be no subsequent cause for reasonable complaint.—When sin is repented of and forsaken, God will mercifully forgive: but the blood of Christ, our Sin-offering, is the only atonement which takes away the guilt of it.—No apparent repentance, amendment, or restitution, will benefit those who reject this propitiation; for their self-dependence proves them still unhumbled.—It is peculiarly afflicting to a pious mind, (though, alas! exceedingly common,) to see those who fill up the most important stations in society, or the most sacred offices in the church, and who are related to the most excellent persons, leading the way, and setting the example, in the most evident violation of the divine law! But when they confess and forsake their sins, avowing publicly their dependence on the atoning blood of the Savior; their pattern in these respects may in some measure counterbalance the effects of their former misconduct: and all the names, which are written in the book of life, are those of penitent believing sinners; not of the self-righteous who think that they have no need of repentance.

THE BOOK OF NEHEMIAH.

THIS book resumes the history of the Jews, about twelve years after the close of the book of Ezra; and contains the latest canonical records of the nation till the days of Christ; reaching down to about a hundred and ten years after the captivity. It was evidently written by Nehemiah himself, who throughout speaks in the first person: and probably it was received among the canonical scriptures by Ezra and his assistants or successors.—Nehemiah, a Jew, the cup-bearer to Artaxerxes king of Persia, hearing of the distressed state of his countrymen; in great affliction petitions him for leave to go up to Jerusalem, as governor, with a commission to rebuild the walls, and to provide for the security and the prosperity of his people. Having obtained his request, he executes his commission for twelve years with great success. After which he returns to Artaxerxes, but at length comes back to Jerusalem; and employs various measures to promote the prosperity of the Jews, and the reformation of abuses.—The frequent devout ejaculations, with which the narrative is interrupted, are peculiar to this pious writer: and his zeal, activity, and disinterestedness are well worthy of imitation; especially by those employed in arduous undertakings, for the good of the church or the community.—This Book has many internal proofs of divine inspiration, and always has been considered by the Jews as a part of their sacred scriptures, and indeed as a continuation of the book of Ezra: it does not, however, seem to contain any prophecies, nor is it explicitly referred to in the New Testament.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1. This book is here called, "The words," (or, as it may be rendered, "The actions,") of "Nehemiah," that is, the history of the services which he performed to the Jewish church and state.—It is uncertain to what tribe or family Nehemiah belonged, though tradition records that he was of the tribe of Judah.—His father Hachaliah seems to have obtained a settlement in the city of Shushan, or Susa, the capital of Persia, where the kings had a royal palace; and thus his son Nehemiah became cup-bearer to Artaxerxes. This was a place of great trust, honor, and emolument: and it was peculiarly desired by those who sought preferment, because it gave access to the king at those seasons of hilarity, when men are most disposed to grant favors.—Nehemiah was cup-bearer to the same Artaxerxes, who before commissioned Ezra. (Note, Ezra 7:1—5.)—The month Chisleu coincides with part of our November and part of December.—Twentieth year.] 2:1. Ezra 7:8.

V. 2. It is supposed, that Hanani, the brother of Nehemiah, and some other Jews, came to Shushan, in order to solicit help from the king against their enemies. (Note, 7:2,3.)—Nehemiah's station in the Persian court had hitherto prevented his going to Jerusalem: but he was an eminently godly man, and deeply concerned about the city and temple of God, and the condition of his brethren in Judea.

V. 3. Ezra's commission, and his attention, had chiefly respected the state of religion, and the re-establishment of the affairs of the Jewish church: and he was not empowered or enabled to fortify the city, or to repel the hostile attempts of the enemies of his people. It is supposed, that the Samaritans, and other adversaries, not only hated the true religion, but were provoked at being dispossessed, by the return of the Jews, from the lands which they had seized upon: and as these returned Jews were but a remnant, compared with the whole nation, and in an unsettled situation, they were unable to defend themselves. The seat of government was very distant; the king's lieutenants were in general unfavorable; and probably the king never heard a full account of the injuries done them.—Either the walls had not been at all built after the captivity; or their enemies had thrown them down again, and burnt the gates with fire: and being thus defenceless and exposed, they were also insulted and reproached for their confidence in God.—'Jerusa-'lem lay without any walls or gates to defend it 'from injuries. ... It was burnt by Nebuchadnez-'zar, and the walls beaten down; therefore their 'meaning is, that the walls and gates lay as the 'Chaldeans left them, after that devastation, and 'were not repaired, though the temple was built 'again.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 4. Nehemiah seems, immediately on hearing the afflicted state of his brethren, to have conceived the design of going to their relief, if he could obtain permission and assistance from the king his patron. But his first application was to that God, in whose hand are the hearts of kings. He therefore spent some days in mourning over the affliction of his people, and in humbling himself before God by fasting and prayer; in order to find mercy from him, and success in 11 O LORD, I beseech thee, [k] let now thine ear be attentive to the prayer of thy servant, and to the prayer of thy servants, [l] who desire to fear thy name; and prosper, I pray thee, thy servant this day, and [m] grant him mercy in the sight of this man. For [n] I was the king's cup-bearer.

his undertaking. (Notes, Ezra 9:3,4. Dan. 9:2,3.)

V. 5—11. In the prayer here recorded, which probably formed the substance of Nehemiah's constant supplications day and night, he adored the greatness and terribleness of God, and his covenanted mercy to his people; (Notes, 1 Kings 8:23,24. Dan. 9:4. Luke 1:67—75. Heb. 6:13—15.) thus acknowledging that if they had not provoked him to anger, by their numerous and heinous crimes; their enemies, instead of triumphing over them, would have experienced his terrible power fighting for them. But alas! Nehemiah was constrained to confess, that both the people in general, and he himself, and his father's house, were deeply guilty, and by dealing very corruptly, (that is, perversely, ungratefully, and deceitfully,) had given the Lord just cause to leave them in the hands of their adversaries. Yet, while he justified God in the miseries of his people, he expressed a confidence in his mercies. The nation of Israel alone professed to worship and serve the God of heaven: he had forewarned them, that if they transgressed, he would scatter them abroad among the nations; but he had also repeatedly and expressly promised, that if they returned to him, and obeyed his commandments, he would gather them again to their own land, and to his chosen city. (Notes, Lev. 26:31—45. Deut. 4:25—31. Dan. 9:5—16.) Now many of those, who had gone up to Jerusalem, were turned to the Lord, and "desired to fear his name:" and it might be hoped that numbers even of those, who remained in other countries, were truly penitent and uprightly obedient; among whom Nehemiah was conscious he was one. And as God had already done great things, both in former ages, and lately, in redeeming and delivering his people from their enemies; he trusted that he would compassionately hear his prayer, and the prayers of all those who were pleading with him in that behalf. (Notes, 1 Chr. 16:34—36. Ezra 9:5—15. Ps. 74:20. 79:6—13. Is. 63:15—19. 64:6—12. Dan. 9:17—19.)—The particular request which he made on this occasion, is remarkable: he prayed that God "would grant him mercy in the sight of this man." The mighty monarch of the Persian empire would be addressed by his flatterers, as if he were more than man; yet Nehemiah knew, that in the sight of God, he was upon a level with his meanest subjects. (Note, 2:4.)—'A deep sense of our own unworthiness is 'a good qualification for the mercy we beg of God. 'This Nehemiah expresses very sensibly.' Bp. Patrick.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4.

Eminent men of God may sometimes be found in situations, where they might be least expected: his grace will be sufficient for them, wherever his providence has cast their lot: and it is seldom advisable to leave the place, where he has blessed us, without an evident call, or a substantial reason; even though we might remove into situations, apparently more favorable to our growth in grace.—The church militant is like the bush, which burned, but was not consumed, because the Lord was there: (Note Ex. 3:2. P. O. 7—12.) afflictions and reproaches are its portion in this evil world: its enemies often presumptuously expect finally to prevail; and its friends through unbelief are sometimes ready to fear that they will. But in the crisis, some unexpected help is afforded, and again it revives and flourishes.—No prosperity can render the real believer inattentive to the cause and people of God. (Note, Ps. 137:1—6, v. 6.) The prevalence of iniquity, the decay of piety, and the ravages of persecution, whilst infidels or idolaters insult and reproach, are like "a sword in his bones." (Ps. 42:10.) As a member of the suffering body of Christ, he will sympathize in its affliction: but this must not suffice. (Notes, 1 Cor. 12:12—26.) He will be inquiring, what service he can render to the common cause, by improving his talents and the advantages of his situation. If he have no more in his power, he may lift up his prayer without ceasing for the remnant that is left: and fasting joined with supplication may well express the believer's penitent sorrow for sin, sympathy with his afflicted brethren, distress to see the cause of God run down, and earnestness in seeking help from him; so that he has no relish for common comforts and enjoyments. Such fervent, humble prayers have always been honored with signal prevalence and success. And these seasons of humiliation are peculiarly suitable, when we are entering upon arduous or perilous undertakings for the benefit of the church.—As the people of God all over the earth form one body; it is good to inquire how our brethren fare in the most remote regions, that we may at least know in what manner we may direct our prayers and praises in their behalf in the most appropriate manner.

V. 5—11.

In all our addresses to the God of heaven we must remember his greatness and terrible majesty; that we may worship "with reverence and godly fear," and in deep humiliation before him. His infinite holiness, justice, truth, and power are terrible to all the workers of iniquity: and they would be so to us all as fallen creatures, were he not also infinitely merciful; and did he not deal with such as repent and believe the gospel, according to a new and gracious covenant. For all have broken his perfect law, in numberless instances: and indeed all are disposed to reject, oppose, or pervert his gospel. And if, by his grace, we are now true believers; we have, even since we became so, "dealt very corruptly, in not keeping the commandments of God." He therefore is righteous in our sufferings, and merciful in all our comforts. We must still come before him as sinners, pleading his gracious promises, and craving to be gathered into his church, and finally into heaven, the place where he displays those glories, which here by faith we feebly apprehend, love, and adore. In this humble, supplicating manner, we may expect all desirable success. May he then grant unto us a spirit of simple dependence on his mercy and grace, united with zeal for his glory, and affection to his people. May we endeavor to improve every talent, as those who are waiting for his coming; and never tarnish or defeat the success of our endeavors, by pride and self-confidence. And may our gracious God stir up those, to whom he has committed many talents, thus humbly and zealously to serve his cause, with faith and prayer; with self-denial, promptitude, and diligence; and with simple dependence on him and devotedness to him!—When worldly men would solicit any favors from kings or nobles, they spare no pains, to obtain the interposition of those distinguished persons who have influence with them: but the children of God must seek to their Father, who could at once secure to them the assistance of all the kings upon earth, if good for them; and though other means may be used, yet "the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth" most of all: and, "Grant me mercy in the sight of this man," offered in faith to that God, in whose hand are the hearts of all men, will do more to ensure success, in any good cause, than all our applications to nobles and princes, to support our petitions. (Notes, 2:4. Gen. 32:28,29. Ezra 7: 27,28. Prov. 21:1.)

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. About four months passed from the time when Nehemiah made his inquiry, before he presented his petition to the king: for Nisan answers to part of March and part of April. (Note, 1:1.) It is probable, that his turn of waiting on the king did not arrive before this: and he could not come into his presence uncalled, except at the hazard of his life; (Note, Esth. 4:11.) but he could approach the King of heaven at any time, and doubtless all the while continued instant in prayer. Yet, when at length he attended on his office, his inward concern was visible in his countenance, which no doubt had always before been very open and cheerful: so that the king observed it; and, not perceiving that he was ill, seemed ready to impute his melancholy to discontent or disaffection. Indeed the words rendered "sad," and "sorrow of heart," might be rendered evil, and wickedness of heart. This excited great alarm in Nehemiah: and in fact these arbitrary monarchs were generally suspicious, in proportion to their tyranny. Lest poison should be mixed with their wine, they required the cup-bearers to drink before them out of the same cup: and some conjecture that Nehemiah, being oppressed with grief, had forgotten to observe this custom. Had the least suspicion, however, been excited of criminal designs, the immediate torture or execution of Nehemiah might have been the consequence: for the Persian monarchs frequently, with little ceremony, thus treated those who had before been their chief favorites. He might also fear that he should fail of his purpose, as the king seemed displeased, and no favorable opportunity for his request was yet afforded.

V. 3. Nehemiah in answering the king, testified his cordial and loyal affection, by wishing the long continuance of his life and prosperity, in the customary manner. He perhaps meant the words likewise as a prayer for his salvation: but they were not generally understood in that sense. Thus, 'God save the king,' as generally used, means no more than, 'Let the king live and prosper:' but the words, when duly attended to, contain a solemn prayer to God, for his temporal preservation, and his eternal salvation. (Marg. Ref.)—Nehemiah said nothing to Artaxerxes concerning the religion of the Jews: perhaps, he saw that he was more regardless in that respect than formerly; (Notes, Ezra 7:6—28.) or he might suppose that the king would not attend to that subject so candidly, from a young courtier, as he had done from an aged priest and learned scribe of the law of God: and some think that he was induced to wave it, because the company present were unfavorable. He therefore represented the afflicted, defenceless state of that city, where his ancestors lay interred; and how could he but be grieved that their sepulchres should be so disgraced, or how avoid sympathizing with his distressed countrymen?—Arguments of this kind the men of the world well understand: but alas! they little feel the force of those which are infinitely more important. Some infer from the expression "my fathers' sepulchres," that Nehemiah was of the tribe of Judah; but his ancestors might have been buried in Jerusalem, if he were of the tribe of Benjamin, or of Simeon.

V. 4. Nehemiah could not, in this emergency, retire for prayer; but he lifted up his heart in a silent ejaculation to "the God of heaven," to prosper him, according to the tenor of those prayers which he had for a long time been presenting before him; and perhaps the concluding part of the prayer contained in the preceding chapter, was secretly offered at this time.—"Prosper, I pray thee, thy servant this day, and grant him mercy in the sight of this man." 'In his mind he silently 'beseeched God to guide his tongue, and to bow 'the king's heart to grant his request.' Bp. Patrick. "The God of heaven" seems to have become the usual style, so to speak, in addressing the Lord, among the returned captives; perhaps as contrasting him with the idols of the regions, in which they had sojourned. (20. 1:4,5. Ezra 5: 11,12. Note, Jer. 10:11

V. 5, 6. It is probable, that Esther was the queen who was present at this time, and that she seconded Nehemiah's request. Perhaps he had been preferred through her interest, and that of Mordecai: and her presence seems to be mentioned, as a favorable and not a common circumstance, and as an answer to his prayers.—For Mordecai's advancement preceded the commission granted to Nehemiah several years. (1:1. Esth. 1:3. 10:3.)—The king was not willing to be long deprived of the service of one, who possessed his confidence and affection: and we may suppose, that Nehemiah obtained leave of absence for a shorter time than he actually continued at Jerusalem: but he either returned to obtain a new commission, or had it renewed in his absence by the special favor of the king.

V. 7 (Note, Ezra 8:21—23.) Ezra went as a priest and a scribe, though armed with civil authority; and in consistency with his character and professions, he would not require a guard. But Nehemiah went to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, and to defend the Jews against their enemies: and it was very consistent with his avowed design, to petition the king, that the governors should be ordered to escort him with proper military attendants, which would afford him protection, and add dignity to his undertaking.—The king likewise ordered him a guard, till he had crossed the Euphrates: (9) for Susa was beyond that river, further to the east than Babylon.

V. 8. 'I suppose he means the forest of Leba-'non, from whence he might be furnished with 'materials for his building.' Bp. Patrick. The word (פַּרְדֵּס) is used only in two other places, (Ec. 2:5. Cant. 4:13.) where it is rendered orchard, and the word παραδεισος, or paradise, seems to have been derived from it, yet here it must signify a forest of timber trees. The palace here mentioned seems to mean the temple, or some of those buildings which surrounded it, or 'the gates of the 'temple;' for though the temple was rebuilt, much might be wanting in respect of the surrounding walls and gates. Nehemiah proposed to build a house also for the governor, and to do all other things, which might place his people in a more secure and respectable situation. (Marg. Ref.) The good hand of my God. (8) Marg. Ref. s. Note, Ezra 7:6—10, v. 9.

V. 10. (Marg. Ref.) Sanballat is supposed to have been a Moabite, of Horonaim, a city of Moab. (Is. 15:5.) Tobiah was an Ammonite, and had been a slave. Moab and Ammon were subjugated and carried captive by the kings of Babylon: but it appears that they had been restored, according to the predictions of Jeremiah. (Notes, Jer. 48:47. 49:6.) And it is likely that Sanballat and Tobiah (as well as Geshem the Arabian afterwards mentioned,) were placed by the king of Persia in authority over their own people, and over the Samaritans, or other tribes in that neighborhood, who were generally enemies to the Jews. —Sanballat and Tobiah, however, were full of malice against them; and exceedingly grieved and displeased to find that one was come from the king of Persia, to protect them from further injuries; 'with such authority from the king, and 'in such favor with him; as appeared by the let-'ters brought with him, and the guard that attend-'ed him, and the diligence of the several gover-'nors, through whose provinces he passed, to 'serve him.' *Bp. Nehemiah was come with a commission from Artaxerxes: but he did not disclose the nature of his business, till he had made previous observations, and consulted with a few select friends, in whom he could place the most entire confidence.

V. 12—16. Nehemiah seems to have used every precaution to conceal his intentions, till he had obtained the unanimous consent of the people, and they were actually employed in the work; knowing that their enemies would attempt to divide or discourage them.—We may suppose that the moon shone, when he made his observations, and that he had provided skilful guides to accompany him in this survey. Yet even they, who afterwards presided and did the work, were not at this time consulted.—The account here given, is well suited to shew us the ruinous and defenceless state of the city, nearly a hundred years after the return of the Jews from captivity: and Nehemiah's personal survey formed a suitable preparation to his address to the people, and would enable him to obviate any objections, and prevent any misrepresentations, which might be made.—Nothing more is known of the several places mentioned, than what may be collected from the marginal references.—My God had put, &c. (12) Marg. Ref. g.—Note, Ezra 7:27,28.

V. 17, 18. The reader will note the piety of the language, used by Nehemiah on this as well as on every other occasion, which resembled that of Ezra. (Marg. Ref. s. in v. 8.) When he exhorted the Jews to arise and exert themselves in rebuilding the wall of the city: he shewed them that the kindness of the Persian king to him, was the effect of the powerful interposition of God in their behalf. Thus they were animated and emboldened to undertake the work.

V. 19, 20. Sanballat, Tobiah, and Geshem, as determined enemies to the Jewish nation, soon got intelligence of Nehemiah's designs, notwithstanding his precautions; (Note 6:17—19.) and they derided the efforts of the Jews, as if the work were impracticable: nay, they represented the undertaking, as an act of rebellion against the king; though they could not but know that Nehemiah acted by his commission! They intended, if possible, to frighten, to disunite, and to dishearten the people, that they might abandon the undertaking. But Nehemiah only answered, that the God of heaven would prosper his servants: but as to their adversaries, they had no portion in him, no right to interfere; nor any memorial in Jerusalem, to prove, that either by birth, or by being proselyted, they were Israelites, as the Samaritans pretended to be. He therefore, very prudently, avoided all further communication. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 10. Ezra 4:3.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—8.

Unavoidable delays, when employed in fervent persevering prayer, often forward the success of pious undertakings.—Cheerfulness is in general an ornament to religion; but there are seasons for mourning when grief cannot be concealed.—"The children of this world" understand the propriety of our grieving, when we are sick and in pain; when impoverished, bereaved, or disappointed in our temporal pursuits: but they cannot conceive, why the heart should be heavy, or the countenance sad, if no outward calamity has befallen us. Yet conscious guilt, the fear or sense of the divine displeasure, the afflictions of God's people, the prevalence of impiety, and the decays of religion, are far more reasonable and important causes of grief; under which no confluence of earthly delights can afford comfort. We must, however, expect that worldly men will ascribe such sorrows to melancholy, discontent, moroseness, or even some more criminal cause: and those, who are strangers to the believer's consolations, are apt to infer from his complaints, that religion is uncomfortable, and unfits men for social life. We should therefore in general conceal our grief, or disclose it only to the Lord and to his people.—The very persons, from whose favor many advantages may be expected, are also greatly to be dreaded. Inconstancy is connected with all the partialities and affections of absolute princes; and suspicions are multiplied in proportion as power is abused. They cannot confide in those, who do not, as they think, serve them from affection: but so many causes may induce courtiers to feign attachment, that they cannot but distrust at times even their favorites. Hence often arises the speedy ruin or disgrace of those, on whom honors and emoluments have been most lavished; without any cause, but caprice or groundless jealousy. "It is therefore better to trust in the LORD, than to put any confidence in princes." (Note, Ps. 118:8,9.)—A meek and modest explanation best tends to banish groundless suspicions. Yet we should study consistency with our character, professions, and relative situations, and consider those of the person we speak to; if we would behave "with wisdom towards them that are without," avoid giving any needless disgust, and do important good to the church of God by their means.—We must not speak falsehood: but we are not bound always to speak all that we think, when a part of it will best answer every useful purpose.—Ejaculatory petitions may be presented to the Lord in any place or company, and should be intermixed with every transaction in which a Christian is engaged. They neither supersede, nor are rendered unnecessary by our more stated devotions: and the habit of thus keeping up an intercourse with Heaven, is of peculiar importance and advantage. Indeed we ought never to engage in any pursuit, in which it would be improper thus to expect and seek the divine direction, assistance, and blessing.—The Lord so orders every circumstance, as may best answer the prayers of his people. He turns their most distressing fears into grateful praises; he exceeds their largest hopes; and even those, who know him not, will be inclined to favor his servants, "according to the good hand of their God upon them."

V. 9—20.

The enemies of the Lord must grieve, in proportion as his servants rejoice, when those in authority, and endowed with suitable qualifications, are raised up to promote the cause of truth and holiness, and the welfare of his church: for the enmity of the serpent's seed against the cause of Christ is confined to no age or nation; it springs from hatred of God himself, and is irritated in proportion as he is glorified. But we ought steadily to proceed with our proper work, possessing our souls in patience, and uniting in our conduct, wisdom, and zeal, vigilance and courage, self-denial and activity. If we even attempt any thing good, in a proper manner, "God hath put it into our hearts." But we should first carefully consider what is most necessary to be done, both in the concerns of our own souls, and in those of the church: and investigation will generally discover a great deal which needs to be rectified.—When matters are fairly proposed, and men in authority or reputation take the lead, and animate others also, the most timid and indolent may be roused and encouraged to action. But favorable opportunities should be seized: and those who would accomplish any useful design, to rescue the church of God from just occasion of reproach, must be strengthened to endure contempt, reviling, and menaces, as well as labor and hardship. "The God of heaven" will prosper his people, and clear their characters from aspersions, as well as deliver them from affliction: but wretched are they, who have no portion, nor right, nor memorial in the new Jerusalem, the city of our God! However, we should always be ready to give a meek and reasonable answer to objectors: and, blessed be God, even despisers and revilers, while they are warned of their danger, may be invited to cease from their opposition, and to be reconciled to God: that, after all, they may have their lot among his people, and not among his enemies.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1. It is supposed that "the sheep-gate" immediately communicated with the temple: and that the cattle for sacrifices were usually brought in that way, and the priests undertook this part, as most properly belonging to them. (Note, John 5:2—4.) Eliashib, the grandson of Jeshua, (12:10.) was the high priest at this time, and he, with his brethren, either his near relations or the chief priests the heads of their several courses, rebuilt this part of the wall at their own expense; and perhaps some of them on this emergency labored at it with their own hands. Along with the gate, they builded a part of the wall on each side. (Marg. Ref. d.) This was the case, it may be supposed, in other instances where the gates alone are mentioned.—Of this part alone it is said, that "they sanctified it;" which may mean, that they began the work with prayer and concluded it with praise, and thus consecrated their service to the Lord, for the security of his temple and worshippers. (Notes, 12:27—43.)

V. 2—4. (Marg. Ref.) After all the pains, which some learned men have bestowed on the subject, which is indeed not very interesting to us, little satisfactory information can be obtained on the situation of the places mentioned in this chapter, beyond what may be collected from the marginal references.

V. 5. Their nobles, &c.] It seems the chief persons of Tekoah refused to give any assistance, either by their labor, their substance, or their servants. Disregarding the authority of God himself, whose work it was, no wonder that they would not submit to the commands of Nehemiah, their governor, who seems to be meant by th expression "their lord:" and for this they are branded with disgrace in the word of God. (Note, 1 Sam. 8:6—9.)—But the inferior citizens, instead of following their example, undertook a second part, when they had completed that which was first allotted them. (27)—The expression "put not their necks," renders it probable, that those who were earnest in the cause, of whatever rank, assisted by their personal labors. 'Well-disposed 'persons, though ever so great, "put their necks."

8 Next unto him repaired Uzziel the son of Harhaiah, of [u] the goldsmiths. Next unto him also repaired Hananiah, the son of one [x] of the apothecaries, and they * fortified Jerusalem unto the [y] broad wall.

9 And next unto them repaired Rephaiah the son of Hur, [z] the ruler of the half part of Jerusalem.

10 And next unto them repaired Jedaiah the son of Harumaph, even [a] over against his house. And next unto him repaired [b] Hattush the son of Hashabniah.

11 Malchijah the son of [c] Harim, and Hashub the son of [d] Pahath-moab, repaired the † other piece, and [e] the tower of the furnaces.

12 And next unto him repaired Shallum the son of Halohesh, [f] the ruler of the half part of Jerusalem, [g] he and his daughters.

13 [h] The valley-gate repaired Hanun, and the inhabitants of [i] Zanoah; they built it, and set up the doors thereof, the locks thereof, and the bars thereof, and a thousand cubits on the wall unto the dung-gate.

14 But [k] the dung-gate repaired Malchiah the son of Rechab, [l] the ruler of part of [m] Beth-haccerem; he built it, and set up the doors thereof, the locks thereof, and the bars thereof.

15 But [n] the gate of the fountain repaired Shallum the son of Col-hozeh, [o] the ruler of part of [p] Mizpah; he built it, and covered it, and set up the doors thereof, the locks thereof, and the bars thereof, and the wall of the pool of [q] Siloah by the king's garden, and unto [r] the stairs that go down from the city of David.

16 After him repaired Nehemiah the son of Azbuk, [s] the ruler of the half part of [t] Beth-zur, unto the place over against [u] the sepulchres of David, and to [x] the pool that was made, and unto [y] the house of the mighty.

17 After him repaired the Levites, Rehum the son of Bani. Next unto him repaired Hashabiah, [z] the ruler of the half part of [a] Keilah, in his part.

18 After him repaired their brethren, Bavai the son of Henadad, the ruler of the half part of Keilah.

19 And next to him repaired Ezer the son of [b] Jeshua, the ruler of [c] Mizpah, another piece over against the going up to the armory, at [d] the turning of the wall.

20 After him Baruch the son of ‡ Zabbai [e] earnestly repaired the other piece from the turning of the wall unto the door of the house of [f] Eliashib the high priest.

21 After him repaired [g] Meremoth the son of Urijah, the son of [h] Koz, another piece, from the door of the house of Eliashib, even to the end of the house of Eliashib.

22 And after him repaired the priests, [i] the men of the plain.

23 After him repaired Benjamin and Hashub [k] over against their house. After him repaired [l] Azariah the son of [m] Maaseiah, the son of Ananiah, by his house.

Probably, Nehemiah now occupied it; for his particular commission superseded their more general authority.

V. 8—10. (Marg. Ref.) Several persons are mentioned who built, or repaired, the wall which was over against their own houses, or chambers. (Marg. Ref. a.)—They lived near the wall; so that this arrangement was most convenient for them: and thus at the same time they provided for their own security, and the common benefit of the city. Perhaps, where any part of the old wall remained, the persons mentioned "repaired;" where none, they "built."

V. 11. It is not known what the expression "the other piece," or, the second measure, (marg.) refers to.

V. 12. Several rulers of half parts of cities are mentioned. (Marg. Ref. f.) It is probable that two superior magistrates were placed over the principal cities, with equal authority, to reside in different parts of them.—Shallum seems to have had no sons; and his daughters, as heiresses, contributed with him to the expense of the work. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The ministers of God should always be ready to labor and venture for the good of their brethren; and those, who have the precedency in rank, ought to take the lead, in setting that good example which gives energy to their instructions: but especially they should teach the people, how to sanctify their secular employments, by beginning, conducting, and completing them, with prayer and thanksgiving, according to the word of God, and to his glory.—The security and prosperity of the church, in every part of the world, is the common cause of all Christians, wherever they reside: and all orders of men should assist in promoting them. No age, sex, or station of life, can free any person from this obligation: every one, in some way or other, may contribute towards it; and where "much is given, much will be required." But alas, the rich and noble generally count it their privilege to be vain, or useless; which they cannot be, without setting an example, mischievous in proportion to their influence: and no wonder that they disregard the proclamations of the prince, which call them to attend the service of God, when they disdain the yoke of the almighty Lord himself. But before him they are upon a level with the meanest of their inferiors; except that a more dreadful punishment, and deeper disgrace, await their impenitent and ungrateful rebellion. Frequently the zeal and activity in the cause of God, of those in the inferior orders, expose and condemn the pride, sloth, and self-indulgence, or impiety, of those who are intrusted with more talents; and thus they whom men despise, obtain and engross that "honor which cometh from God."—If in times of prevalent ungodliness, numbers, in different stations would agree, first to look to themselves, and to reform their families as far as they could; and then to use all their influence to promote the general work of reformation, we might expect that much good would speedily be done: and though most men still neglect this duty; let those who lament the triumphs of iniquity and the desolations of piety, every one "repair opposite to his own house" or "chamber;" and let all endeavor to do what they can, by their prayers, their example, the education of their children, and pious conversation, to promote and recommend that cause which they have espoused. And when such attempts are directed by men of vigor, prudence, and piety, and conducted with entire harmony, remote from envy, contention, or divisions; and when every one, beside doing his proper work earnestly, is ready to assist those who are overburdened; there is no reason to doubt of success: "for the fruit of righteousness is sown in peace of them that make peace."—May the Lord stir up the hearts of all his people, to lay aside their disputes, and to disregard their worldly interests, in comparison of "building the walls of Jerusalem," and defending the cause of evangelical truth, and vital godliness, against the assaults of avowed enemies. May those offences cease, which weaken the common cause, and expose it to reproach: and may the church of Christ thus fortified, as "a city that is at unity in itself," and adorned by the beauties of holiness, attract the attention, the admiration, and the love of beholders; silence the reproaches of calumniators, and dismay the heart, or repel the assaults, of every hostile invader! Amen.

CHAP. IV.

Sanballat and his company are very wroth, and mock the Jews: but Nehemiah prays, and builds the wall, 1—6. He discovers that they secretly are plotting against him, and sets a watch, 7—12. He arms the builders, and gives them suitable orders and directions, 13—23.

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. (Notes, 2:9,10,19,20.) Sanballat, and the other enemies of the Jews, though enraged at them for undertaking to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, were restrained from openly opposing them, partly because they despised their feeble attempts. They concluded, either that they would not venture to undertake such a work; or if they did, that they would make little progress, however earnest they might be. But when they heard that all hands were diligently employed, they became very angry; yet they effected to treat the undertaking with the utmost disdain. Sanballat uttered his sarcasms before his brethren, (or the principal commanders in that neighborhood,) and the army of Samaria; whom he knew to be more inveterate against the Jews, than any other of the tribes under his command: but he supposed what he said would soon be reported at Jerusalem, and tend to discourage the builders. With a mixture of scorn and indignation, he inquired, "what the feeble Jews were doing." Could they think of fortifying so large a city? Did they intend to complete such a work in a day, and to secure themselves from interruption, while they spent the next in sacrificing? And what would they do for materials? The stones formerly used in this work were broken in pieces, or decayed, by lying so long under the rubbish; the builders could not "revive" them, or make them new again, nor could they procure any others. With equal disdain Tobiah replied, that a wall built by them, in such haste, and of such materials, would be no security at all; for the weight of a fox running over it would break it down! But this contempt and ridicule induced them to lose the opportunity of attempting more effectual opposition.

V. 4, 5. The Jews were at this time the church of God: they were actually employed in his service: their enemies, without the smallest ground of complaint against them, despised and hated them for his sake: if they succeeded in their designs they would subvert true religion; and their condign punishment would form a salutary example to all other adversaries, and be subservient to the cause of truth and righteousness. So that, zeal for the honor of God, and love to his people, induced Nehemiah to pray, that these scorners might be exposed to that reproach which they cast on the Jews, and become "a prey to their enemies in the land of captivity;" and that their sins might not be covered, or blotted out, by the merciful forgiveness of God: seeing they had endeavored to discourage the builders, and render them disaffected to their work; (Marg. Ref. i—l.)—Such scriptural requests are prophetical, or declaratory of the judgments of God against persecutors: and the subsequent doom of these nations was an answer to this prayer. (Notes, Ps. 69:21—28. 109:6—20.) 'This prayer ... was confirmed by the de-'struction of these nations by the Maccabees and 'their successors.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 6. The half, &c.] The whole circuit of the wall was completed to half of the intended height.—Had a mind to work.] They 'were very 'much set upon it, and went about it cheerfully, 'notwithstanding their jeers and contempt.' Bp Patrick. (Marg. Ref. n.)

V. 7, 8. All these nations, (except perhaps the Arabians,) were subjects of the kings of Persia; and were induced by Sanballat to unite against Nehemiah and the Jews, when acting by the king's commission; so that their attempt was a conspiracy in the most criminal sense. Dreading either the resentment of the king, or the valor of the Jews; they had not hitherto dared to attack them openly, notwithstanding the greatness of their malice. (Notes, Matt. 26:3—5. Acts 23:12—22.) 'The last words in the Hebrew are 'to make an error in it; that is, to put them by 'the work, or to make them not know which way 'to turn themselves.' Bp. Patrick.

unto our God, and [x] set a watch against them day and night, because of them.

10 And Judah said, [y] The strength of the [z] bearers of burdens is decayed, and there is much rubbish; so that we are not able to build the wall.

11 And our adversaries said, [a] They shall not know, neither see, till we come in the midst among them, and slay them, and cause the work to cease.

12 And it came to pass, that when the Jews which dwelt by them came, they said unto us [b] ten times, * From all places whence ye shall return unto us, they will be upon you. [Practical Observations.]

13 Therefore [c] set I in † the lower places behind the wall, and on the higher places, I even set the people after their families with [d] their swords, their spears, and their bows.

14 And I looked, and rose up, and said unto the nobles, and to the rulers, and to the rest of the people, [e] Be not ye afraid of them: [f] remember the LORD, which is [g] great and terrible, and [h] fight for your brethren, your sons, and your daughters, your wives, and your houses.

15 And it came to pass, when our enemies heard that it was known unto us, and [i] God had brought their counsel to nought, that we returned all of us to the wall, [k] every one unto his work.

16 And it came to pass from that time forth, that the half of [l] my servants wrought in the work, and the other half of them held both the spears, the shields, and the bows, and the habergeons; and the rulers were behind all the house of Judah.

17 They which builded on the wall, and they that [m] bare burdens, with those that laded, every one [n] with one of his hands wrought in the work, and with the other hand held a weapon.

18 For the builders, every one had his sword girded ‡ by his side, and so builded: and [o] he that sounded the trumpet was by me.

19 And I said unto the nobles, and to the rulers, and to the rest of the people, The work is great and large, and we are separated upon the wall, one far from another.

V. 9. The connexion, here marked, between the greatest simplicity and piety, in trusting God alone and seeking help from him by prayer, and the most vigilant and diligent activity in the use of all proper means, is well worthy of notice.

V. 10. Some of the principal persons among the Jews, while the work was in hand, represented to Nehemiah, that the people were so worn down, and the remaining labor (especially in removing the rubbish to get materials,) was so great, that their design was impracticable, and must be abandoned at least for the present. This must have been a great discouragement to him, in conjunction with all his other difficulties and dangers. (Notes, Ps. 11:1—3. Hag. 1:2,4.)

V. 11. Some think, that certain of the princes reported these sayings of the adversaries, in order to intimidate the builders; being themselves weary of the labor, and not cordially affected to the cause. It was not however likely, that Sanballat could introduce into the city so large a number of soldiers, as would suffice to overpower and destroy all the Jews, and stop the work; without being discovered, till he and his troops were in the midst of the builders. Indeed the conduct of those, who reported such a design, was more suited to intimidate the inconsiderate, than to convince wise men that they really expected it would be carried into execution.

V. 12. This verse is of difficult construction; which seems to have been the effect of the abrupt manner, in which the persons intended expressed their excessive terror. They lived near the hostile nations, and some of them were continually coming to Jerusalem with information, that the enemy was preparing to attack the builders from every quarter; and would certainly fall upon them, whether they continued at their work, or attempted to return home. Probably, they meant to put their brethren upon their guard: but such alarming rumors tended to intimidate them and drive them from the work. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 13—15. (Marg. Ref.) 'All was at stake, 'therefore he exhorts them to be valiant, trusting 'in God, who was stronger than all their ene-'mies.' Bp. Patrick. After all the preparations which Nehemiah and the Jews had made, the conspirators did not venture to attack them: and, neither being able to surprise them, nor fright them from their design, they for the present desisted; and so the Jews returned to their work.

V. 16—18. The builders could not possibly have made any progress, if they had literally held a weapon in one of their hands. Indeed it is evident, that they wore their swords by their sides. But the expression is figurative, implying that every man was both a builder, and a soldier. They worked, and bare arms, by turns: they wore swords at their labor, and those behind them had other arms ready, when the alarm should be given.—Nehemiah, being earnest in the undertaking, employed all his attendants in one way or other about it.

V. 19, 20. The priests were directed to blow the sacred trumpets; (Note, Num. 10:2—10.) and no doubt some of them constantly attended, one

CHAP. V.

The poor Jews complain of the debts which they had unavoidably contracted, and which compelled them to mortgage their lands, and even sell their children, 1—5. Nehemiah rebukes the rich usurers, who oppress their brethren; and obliges them to engage by oath to make full restitution, 6—13. He refuses the governor's customary allowances, and maintains great hospitality at his own charge, 14—19.

AND there was [a] a great cry of the people, and of their wives, against [b] their brethren the Jews.

2 For there were that said, [c] We, our sons and our daughters, are many: therefore [d] we take up corn for them, that we may eat and live.

at least, in the different stations, which were selected for the purpose, to sound the alarm when needful: and this was a token that the Lord would fight for his people against their enemies. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 22. Those, who lived in the adjacent cities and villages, were required to lodge, with one or more servants, in Jerusalem, to guard the work, and be ready for it in the morning; for this was to be attended to in preference even to their own families, as being more exposed to the assaults of their enemies. (Note, 11:1,2.)

V. 23. Nehemiah and his attendants, in order that they might always be prepared against any alarm, took necessary rest by turns, in their clothes and armor; never undressing themselves, except for cleanliness, or ceremonial purification. Or as the margin renders the words, "Every one went with his weapon for water."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

The pious labors of those, who endeavor to promote true religion, must always excite the indignation of such as are "haters of God," and of his truth and holiness: nay, in this case, the wisest and most excellent behavior will be reproached and derided, as madness and folly.—The most sacred things may easily be represented in so ridiculous a light, as to excite profane laughter: a small measure of wit, united with competent malice, impiety, and impudence, will suffice for these pernicious and profane scoffings; and such presumptuous jesters whet one another's ingenuity, and embolden each other to the most daring blasphemies. Contempt and derision are indeed very painful to us: but they frequently prove the Christian's protection, and give him leisure to effect his designs, without more formidable opposition.—The means which he uses appear feeble to proud despisers; but, by the power and blessing of God, they produce durable and extensive effects: and all the efforts of man, seconded by the power and policy of hell, have failed, and ever will fail, to subvert the cause, which infidels have dreamed would fall of itself, or on the first assault. Ere long the church on earth will triumph over every adversary: and all believers will soon offer the sacrifice of praise, for complete and eternal victory and salvation; notwithstanding the scoffs and rage of their enemies.—When insulted or injured, let us then give up ourselves to prayer: and the supplications of believers, throughout the world, for the prosperity of the church, and the success of the gospel, will eventually be answered in the reproach and merited punishment, of all impenitent opposers. So long as they reject the atonement, their sins cannot be covered; and their endeavors to hinder the progress of the gospel will provoke the Lord above all their other sins.—Those, who disagree in almost every other thing, will often unite in persecution: (Note, Matt. 22:15—22.) and that enmity, which at one time dictates contempt and derision, will at another suggest more violent and cruel measures; especially when the servants of God are active, united, and successful. So that proud scorners are not fit to be trusted with power; whatever professions of candor they may make, or however they may plead for toleration.—When we engage in important and useful undertakings, we should expect discouragement from every quarter. For we shall be tried, not only by the anger, contempt, treachery and cruelty of enemies, but also by the inconstancy and lukewarmness of friends and helpers: and many who wish well to us will weaken our hands, by regarding and reporting the menaces, or slanders, or boastings of our adversaries.

V. 13—23.

No opposition will prove any real hindrance to us, in our endeavors to do good, if we be led by it to a more simple confidence in God, and to the more diligent use of proper means for obtaining success. A believing remembrance of his power, truth, and love, will prove a sufficient support in every danger; for "if God be for us, who can be against us?" and, however craftily the plots of opposers are laid, he is able to detect them, and to bring to nought all their counsels.—If our enemies cannot fright us from our duty, or deceive us into sin, or find us unwatchful, they cannot hurt us. When ministers of religion or other active instruments, add the example of diligence, courage, self-denial, and patience, to their exhortations; others will be stirred up, who were before drawn or driven from their work.—Every true Christian is both a laborer and a soldier, working with one hand and fighting with the other, and called by the sound of the gospel, alternately to his work and to the conflict. We are widely dispersed in our several employments; but we all form one army, and must prepare to unite against the common enemy, in whatever place the assault is made. In this important cause personal and relative interests must be comparatively disregarded: or rather they are most wisely attended to, when we commit them to the Lord, and labor for the benefit of his church. While we stand armed and watching, as for the battle, we shall have the best security for peace; for Satan fears assaulting the vigilant Christian: or if we are attacked, "our God will fight for us." Thus must we wait to the close of life, never putting off our armor, till

NOTES.

Chap. V. V. 1—5. It seems, that the attention of Nehemiah was interrupted, before the wall was completed, by the affair recorded in this chapter. (Note, 6:15,16.) Amidst the depredations to which the Jews were exposed, and their attention to self-defence, it is likely that tillage was in some degree neglected, and that a scarcity of corn ensued. It is also supposed by learned men, that these events occurred in the sabbatical year; which if indeed it were so, would increase the difficulties of the poor, as well as aggravate the guilt of those, who thence took occasion to oppress their brethren. The nation seems also to have been visited with scarcity for their sins. Such persons, therefore, as were in low circumstances, and had large families, were unable to buy necessary food, except upon credit, and probably at an exorbitant price; and they were compelled to raise money, by borrowing on interest, for the tribute imposed by the king of Persia. (Note, 9:36,37.) Of these difficulties the monied men took advantage, and, obtaining mortgages of their lands, got them into their possession: taking usury also for the money, of one hundredth part every month, or twelve per cent. a year, as it is generally supposed; which soon reduced the debtors to deep poverty; and at length to the necessity of selling into slavery their sons, and even their daughters; who would be peculiarly exposed in that situation: while there appeared no prospect of redress, no hope of redeeming either their lands or their children, no period to their accumulating distresses, except in entire and perpetual bondage. Yet they were not only of the same nature, but of the same chosen seed, the children of the covenant, equally with the more prosperous Jews. They had the same affection for their children, and accounted a numerous family a blessing, as long as they could provide for it. They had not reduced themselves to this distress by extravagance; but were necessitated to contract debts, through hard times and heavy taxes, and for necessary provisions: and the conduct of their oppressors was contrary to the letter and the spirit of the whole law. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Gen. 47:13—26. Ex. 22:25—27. Lev. 25:35—37. Deut. 15:2—10. 24:10—13. 2 Kings 4:1. Ez. 22:12,13.) In this extremity they appealed to Nehemiah, and he immediately determined to do them justice.

V. 6, 7. Nehemiah appears to have possessed a far more bold and eager spirit, than his contemporary Ezra. For, in a situation something similar, Ezra fasted, prayed, wept, and almost desponded: (Note, Ezra 9:) but Nehemiah, fired with a holy indignation, united by sympathy with the poor sufferers, proceeded immediately, with all his authority and influence, to redress the grievances of his oppressed brethren; neither fearing the resentment of their powerful oppressors, nor doubting but he should be able to effect his purpose. (Notes, Job 29:12—17. 31:33,34. Ps. 82:2—4. Prov. 31:8,9.) He did not, however, act without consideration: but, having formed his plan after mature deliberation, he first sharply rebuked the nobles and rulers, who, instead of punishing other criminals, were themselves the most notorious usurers and extortioners. And, as he feared lest they should prove refractory, he convened an assembly of the people; that perceiving how generally their conduct was disapproved, they might be shamed into proper concessions, without the necessity of direct compulsion.

V. 8. Nehemiah, and Ezra, and other pious persons, had not only, with great zeal and earnestness, endeavored to establish the security and prosperity of the nation; but they had redeemed from slavery several of the poor Jews who had been sold among the heathen. (Note, Lev. 26:47—55.) What a contrast then was the conduct of these usurers, to their disinterested and liberal love to their countrymen! Did the one company redeem their enslaved brethren, that the other might sell them again for slaves, in direct violation of the divine law? Or did they expect to sell their enslaved brethren to Nehemiah and his friends, even as the gentiles took their money for such as they redeemed?—It was indeed impossible to reply to this animated and reasonable expostulation. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9. When Nehemiah said, "It is not good that ye do," his words imply that they had acted very wickedly. 'A soft form of speech, used 'when they mean it is very bad. Prov. 16:29.

and corn: [z] I pray you let us [a] leave off this usury.

11 [b] Restore, I pray you, to them, even this day, [c] their lands, their vineyards, their olive-yards, and their houses, also the hundredth part of the money, and of the corn, the wine, and the oil, that ye exact of them.

12 Then said they, [d] We will restore them, and will require nothing of them; so will we do as thou sayest. Then [e] I called the priests, and took an oath of them, that they should do according to this promise.

13 Also [f] I shook my lap, and said, [g] So God shake out every man from his house, and from his labor, that performeth not this promise, even thus be he shaken out and *emptied. And all the congregation said, [h] Amen, and [i] praised the LORD. And [k] the people did according to this promise.

15 But the former governors, that had been before me, were chargeable unto the people, and had taken of them bread and wine, beside forty shekels of silver; yea, [o] even their servants bare rule over the people: but [p] so did not I, [q] because of the fear of God.

16 Yea, also [r] I continued in the work of this wall, [s] neither bought we any land: and [t] all my servants were gathered thither unto the work.

Bp. Patrick. (Marg. Ref. t.) The exposed and distressed condition to which sin had reduced the nation, and the recent mercies which they had received, combined to enforce it upon them, to "walk in the fear of God," lest he should give them up as a reproach to their enemies: or rather, lest the heathen, who were full of malice, should reproach them, as they justly might, for their avarice and cruelty; and thence take occasion to revile their religion, and blaspheme the name of God himself. (Marg. Ref. u, x.)

V. 10—13. Had Nehemiah, and his brethren and servants, acted towards the people, as these oppressors did: the authority of the Persian king would have enabled them to exact large contributions, from the rich especially. But as they, instead of such exactions, did not so much as take what was justly their due; (Note, 14,15.) surely the rich ought to be ashamed of extorting from the poor, what they could have no shadow of a right to! Nehemiah therefore urged them voluntarily to leave off their usury, and to restore the lands of their poor brethren, and the increase of money and provisions, which they had exacted from them; to lend them without pledge or usury, in this time of distress; and to wait for payment till better times. This seems the immediate purport of his proposal: though probably he required the free remission of former debts, and the liberating of the children which were in bondage, as in the year of release.—His remonstrance had its desired effect, and the guilty persons promised to do so: but lest they should delay, or go back from their word, he called the priests as witnesses, and bound the persons concerned with a solemn oath to perform their promise; and then with a significant action, he denounced the vengeance of heaven, against every one who failed of this engagement. To this the congregation solemnly assented, and praised the Lord for sending them so just and merciful a ruler. (Notes, Jer. 34:8—22.)—Thus this matter was in one assembly amicably settled, by motives and arguments taken from true religion, and the law of God: yet one of a similar kind distracted the Roman state for ages, and the oppression was never effectually prevented! (Notes, 2 Chr. 28:9—15. 1 Tim. 6:1—5.)

V. 14—18. This passage must have been added by Nehemiah several years after the date of the transaction before recorded: for that occurred soon after he came to Jerusalem.—The former governors had received from the people an income of about five pounds a day, (as it is generally interpreted;) besides a proportion of bread and wine for their households: while their attendants, (as it is too commonly the case,) lorded it over the people, and increased their burdens. It is not said who these governors were. Perhaps Ezra, who seems not to have been rich, was necessitated to take sufficient for the expenses of his station; but we may be sure, that he allowed of no oppression. It is probable, however, that the Persian governors west of the Euphrates were meant: for they seem to have had authority over the Jews in all civil concerns, until Nehemiah's commission was granted. But he, acting in the fear of God and from the pure motives of religion, and perceiving the poverty of the people, and the burdens in other respects laid upon them, would not receive this customary emolument: and, being very rich and liberal, he supported his dignity with great hospitality at his own expense, all the time he filled that exalted station; setting his rich countrymen an example of receding from legal claims for the public good. At the same time he spared neither trouble nor expense in forwarding the fortifications of the city; and required his attendants to assist also: and would neither himself take, nor allow them to take, any advantage of the poverty of the Jews, by purchasing estates at a low price, as they might easily have done.—In reading this account which he gave of himself, we should remember, that he wrote under the guidance of the Holy Spirit: and it was proper that his magnanimous disinterested, and liberal conduct should stand upon record, for an example to all others, what use to make of great riches; how to render authority a public blessing; and how to induce mankind to acts of justice and every good work, by taking the lead in them. (Notes, 1 Cor. 9:13—18. 2 Cor. 11:7—12, 16—20. 12:11—15.)—'He loved religion better 'than riches, and took not his own due, that the 'people might serve God more cheerfully. ... 'They' (his servants) 'were constantly employed 'also in the same work, and received no pay for 'their labor, though it could not be done without 'neglect of his private business. ... There is no reason to think, that he speaks too much of himself, and his own worthy acts; for it was no more than ... St. Paul was constrained to speak of himself in his epistle to the Corinthians; of whom he would take nothing, that he might stop the mouths of false apostles and covetous people.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 19. Nehemiah had shewn great kindness o his brethren, to which they had not, in strict justice, any claim; and he lifted up his heart to God, when recording it, entreating him to shew like kindness to him, and to remember him for good. His conduct in these circumstances evidenced that he was a true believer: he desired no recompense from man, but confidently expected one from a merciful God: he evidently spoke and acted as one that knew himself to be a sinner; and he did not expect a recompense as of debt; but in the manner, that the Lord rewards a cup of cold water given to a disciple for his sake. (Notes, 13:14. Matt. 10:40—42. Heb. 6:9,10.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—13.

Every domestic or relative comfort may become to us an occasion of increasing anguish: we should not then be discontented in the want of children, or anxious about temporal things; but seek our whole happiness from God alone.—It is the peculiar duty and privilege of the poor, to trust the promise and providence of God, to supply their families with food and raiment, and to be content with necessaries; and of the rich, and of those who have no children, to contribute liberally to the support of their indigent brethren. But alas! too many take advantage of the necessities, to which others are reduced, in order to exact on them; that they may increase their own useless abundance, or support their luxurious and extravagant expenses! They wilfully forget, that the poor are of the same nature with themselves; and that they have the same wants, inclinations, natural affections, and feelings of pain and suffering. Instead of "doing to others, as they would that others should do to them;" they grow careless of the welfare, and callous to the miseries, of their fellow-creatures; and usurp authority over them, as bond-slaves, in proportion as wealth, power, and prosperity increase. Every gratification is deemed requisite for the lordly oppressors; but the meanest morsel is good enough for the poor and enslaved, though far better characters than themselves. Thus men prey upon their own species, and, by "despising the poor, reproach their Maker;" and aggravate, instead of relieving, those distresses, which are always entitled to compassion and assistance; and especially, when they are not the effect of extravagance, or sloth; but of hard times, heavy taxes, large families, and debts contracted for bare necessaries. (Notes, Prov. 14: 31. 17:5. P. O. 1—15, latter part.) Such conduct disgraces even human nature; but who can express sufficient abhorrence of it when adopted by professed Christians? It exposes our holy religion to the reproach, scorn, and abomination of heathens, and gives occasion to our enemies to blaspheme that worthy name, by which these selfish wretches are improperly distinguished. Thus, in all the four quarters of the globe, millions of Mohammedans and Pagans abhor Christianity, through the avarice, treachery, and cruelty of men called Christians!--Well then may the report of such crimes, and the cry of the oppressed, kindle an honest indignation in the breast of every friend of mankind, of his country, and of the gospel. Those in authority should consult with themselves, and with each other, how to redress these scandalous abuses: and if fair means will not do, rough and decisive measures should be employed, notwithstanding the clamors of interested oppressors; if princes would have the blessing of God upon their dominions. Too often nobles and rulers are the chief in such exactions; and their power and affluence seem to defy investigation, and frequently prevent or intimidate those, who ought to promote the execution of justice: yet neither rank nor authority should screen them; nay, they should be first punished, for an example to others: and if they disregard the rebuke of an individual, the great assemblies of nations should be convened against them. If, however, they can be shamed or persuaded into a proper conduct, harsher measures are ineligible: and when earnestness, affection, wisdom, piety, humanity, a decided example, and cogent reasonings, concur, they will sometimes produce effect beyond expectation.—In expostulating with selfish people, it is good to contrast their conduct with that of others, who are remarkably liberal and benevolent: but it is best to point out to them the example of him, who, "though he was rich, yet for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich." When this is compared with the conduct of those, who do not care how many they reduce to the most abject penury or slavery, to enrich themselves; the contrast, between the Master and his professed disciples, is so striking, that it implies an argument, which silencing, and unanswerable on any scriptural principles. It may further be inquired, whether such oppression is good in itself, or consistent with the fear of God, regard to his authority, and his command to love our neighbors as ourselves: whether men can deny, that the enemies of our holy religion do reproach us, because of such practices, and are prejudiced to their irreparable damage: and how they would approve it, if their superiors tyrannized over them, and extorted

NOW it came to pass, [a] when Sanballat, and Tobiah, and [b] Geshem the Arabian, and the rest of our enemies, heard that I had builded the wall, and that there was [c] no breach left therein; (though [d] at that time I had not set up the doors upon the gates;)

2 That Sanballat and Geshem sent unto me, saying, [e] Come, let us meet together in some one of the villages in the plain of [f] Ono. But [g] they thought to do me mischief.

3 And [h] I sent messengers unto them, saying, I [i] am doing a great work, so that I cannot come down: why should the work cease, whilst I leave it, and come down to you?

from them, as they do from their inferiors; and what will become of them, if God shew them no more mercy, than they shew their poor brethren. (Note, Jam. 2:9—13, v. 13.) If our oppressors and slave-dealers were not, by habits long persisted in, more callous than these Jews, we might be encouraged to entreat and beseech them to leave off their extortion; to make restitution to the injured, and to shew mercy to the poor. But alas! these methods are seldom successful! and more conclusive reasons alone prevail. This remains for the magistrate; and here the preacher must leave them. If arguments, expostulations, warnings, and persuasions will not induce them "to repent, and to do works meet for repentance:" we must "shake off the dust of our feet, as a testimony against them;" assuring them that God will soon shake them out from their ill-gotten treasures, and cast them down into destruction; (Note, Jam. 5:1—6.) if they continue to neglect the salvation of Christ, or refuse to imitate his example of loving-kindness and mercy: and when the righteous Judge shall denounce this tremendous sentence against them, all the multitudes of the redeemed will cry, "Amen, and will praise the LORD."—We may further observe, that wise and good men may be of very different tempers, and consequently go about the same thing in a different manner. But they should not censure each other, nor should others censure them: let them serve God according to that ability which he has given them; and let it never be supposed, that one mere man is a perfect model for all others to follow.

V. 14—19.

We must not do our works to be seen of men, and it is seldom expedient to speak of them ourselves. Yet we should "let our light shine before men, that they may see our good works, and glorify God:" (Notes, Matt. 5:14—16. 6:1—4.) and sometimes a good man may be called upon, as in his presence, and with an appeal to the consciences of many witnesses, to declare his own disinterested and upright conduct, and the motives of it, for a reproof, an instruction, and an example, to mankind. But it is always necessary for those to set a decidedly good example, who are bold reprovers and active reformers of others, and who speak and act with decision and sharpness against their crimes. In this case a man should give up his right, neglect opportunities of gain, be willing to labor and endure hardship without recompense, and to expend his substance in the support of a good cause. And it is not enough for public characters themselves to avoid evil, and the appearance of it: their servants and dependents must be restrained also. But the fear and love of God, and genuine love of the brethren, will influence a man to do this and much more; and will constrain him to abound in hospitality and every good work, according to the ability that God has given him. These are proper evidences and expressions of living faith; and our reconciled God will look for good, on such as abound in these fruits of righteousness, according to all that they have done to his people.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1—4. Sanballat and his confederates, not daring openly to attack the Jews, yet earnestly desiring to prevent the completion of the fortifications, which were daily carried on; formed a stratagem to draw Nehemiah from his station, and to slay or imprison him, when they had him in their power. They therefore, on some plausible pretence, invited him to an interview: but he was aware of their intentions; and on that account would not have gone if he had not been so fully engaged. He, however, only answered, that, being fully employed in a most important work, his presence at Jerusalem was absolutely necessary; and that the work would stop if he left it: why then should he come down, in such circumstances? This was true, and a sufficient reason: and their subsequent importunity could not induce him either to comply, or to enter into any altercation with them; as indeed it was well calculated to confirm his suspicions. (Notes, Judg. 16:6—16.) 'They thought, I suppose, that if they 'did not take this opportunity to overthrow what 'he had done, before he set up the doors upon the 'gates, they should never be able to enter the city but [u] thou feignest them out of thine own heart.

9 For [x] they all made us afraid, saying, [y] Their hands shall be weakened from the work, that it be not done. [z] Now therefore, O God, strengthen my hands.

[Practical Observations.]

10 Afterward I came unto the house of [a] Shemaiah the son of Delaiah, the son of Mehetabeel, who was [b] shut up; and he said, [c] Let us meet together in [d] the house of God, within the temple; and [e] let us shut the doors of the temple: for they will come to slay thee; yea, [f] in the night will they come to slay thee.

11 And I said, [g] Should such a man as I flee? and who is there, that, being as I am, [h] would go into the temple to save his life? I will not go in.

12 And, lo, [i] I perceived that [k] God had not sent him; but that he pronounced this prophecy against me: for Tobiah and Sanballat had [l] hired him.

13 Therefore was he hired, [m] that I should be afraid, and do so, and sin, and [n] that they might have matter for an evil report, [o] that they might reproach me.

14 [p] My God, [q] think thou upon Tobiah and Sanballat, according to these their works, and [r] on the prophetess Noadiah, and the rest of the prophets, that would have put me in fear.

'afterwards. He still persisted constantly to give 'no other answer; whereby they might understand 'he was resolved to finish the work.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 5—9. When these most inveterate enemies had been baffled in their design, they devised a more dangerous stratagem. Sanballat sent, under a pretence of friendship, to inform Nehemiah of a report in circulation, that the Jews were preparing to revolt from the king of Persia, and place him on the throne; and that he employed prophets, who should preach this to them, as the will of God. This, Gashmu, or Geshem, (2) attested to be fact, and was prepared to prove: and, being circulated in the surrounding nations, it was likely soon to come to the ears of Artaxerxes, and to bring upon the Jews the whole weight of his indignation.—If such reports had indeed been circulated and credited, there would have been cause for alarm: for those despotic kings, upon the least suspicion, often drove their lieutenants into rebellion, as their only hope of self-preservation. But it was entirely a fiction invented to frighten Nehemiah, or to render him incapable of proceeding. The letter was sent open; that the contents, being known to the people, might excite them to mutiny, or to forsake the work for fear of the Persians: (Notes, 2 Kings 18:26—35.) and the proposal of taking counsel with him, as if Sanballat and his friends were desirous of concerting measures for the common safety, was an artful device made in order to get him into their hands, that they might do him mischief. But Nehemiah, being conscious of his innocency, and satisfied that no such reports were circulated, simply denied the charge, and let them know, that he was aware that the whole was their own fiction: and, as they intended to weaken his hands from his work, he took occasion to beg of God to "strengthen his hands." The words, O God, are not in the original; and some interpret the sentence, as Nehemiah's resolution to proceed with increasing earnestness: but they seem rather to be an ejaculation; and the omission of the address implies the holy, yet reverend familiarity, with which this pious man communed with his condescending Father and Friend, and shews that his heart was habitually employed in thinking of his God. (Note, John 20:11—17.)

V. 10—14. Sanballat and his party being once more baffled, employed a still more subtle and dangerous expedient, suborning persons, who were reputed to be prophets, to give Nehemiah evil counsel in the name of God. The principal person concerned was Shemaiah, of whom Nehemiah seems previously to have had a good opinion. He was "shut up" in some chamber adjoining the sanctuary, probably as a token of his own fear, and a sign to Nehemiah of what he ought to do; who, perhaps being sent to, went to confer with him, as a friend and a prophet. The environs of the temple were secured by walls and gates, while the gates of the city were not set up. Shemaiah therefore professed great concern for Nehemiah's safety; and counselled him to take refuge in the temple with him, lest his enemies should come and murder him by night; or that very night, as his words seem to imply. If Nehemiah had followed this advice, he would have lost his reputation for courage and confidence in God; and have appeared weak and contemptible: the people would have taken the alarm, deserted the work, and sought their own safety: the accusations of his enemies would have gained credit, even in the Persian court; and he would have appeared conscious of bad intentions. In short, it would have overturned his whole design, and given his enemies their desired advantage. (Notes, Matt. 4:1—11.) But Nehemiah soon saw through this project likewise. From the nature of the counsel, and by proper investigation, he perceived that Shemaiah was not delivering a message from God; but that he pronounced this prophecy against him, intending his ruin; having been hired by Tobiah and Sanballat, that Nehemiah might contract guilt, and expose himself to reproach.—When the rank of Nehemiah, and his authority, were considered, with his conscious integrity and professed confidence in God, and the importance of his work, it appeared very inconsistent for him to flee and hide himself. In such circumstances, even the preservation of life form ed but a subordinate consideration: the support of the public cause, by an example of intrepidity, firmness, and consistency, ought to be first considered. Any brave commander would venture his life, when the event of a decisive battle, and the fate of his country were at stake, and would scorn to flee at the appearance of danger: how much more then should Nehemiah venture his, for the glory of God and the benefit of his church! To take refuge in the temple in such a case, would be to prefer a disgraceful short-lived safety, to the most important of all causes. (Note, Acts 8:1.) Nehemiah, therefore, not only with decided firmness rejected this counsel, as inconsistent with the most evident scriptural principles: but, as Shemaiah, and Noadiah the prophetess, and the other pretended prophets, had most basely sold their services to the enemies of God and religion; he subjoins his prayers for their confusion and disappointment. (Note, 2 Tim. 4:14,15.)

V. 15, 16. This important and difficult work was completed in so very short a time, and under so many disadvantages, that even the adversaries of the Jews were convinced that God had prospered them. He had given them health, strength, courage, and unity; he had restrained their opposers and kept off interruptions; and he succeeded the whole by his blessing: so that "the work was wrought of their God." This dejected their enemies, and made them forebode the future prevalence of the Jews; but it did not allure them to desire a portion among that favored people. (Notes, 1 Sam. 24:16—22. Esth. 6:13.)—Elul. (15) Answering to part of August and part of September, as it is supposed: for it is not elsewhere mentioned.

V. 17—19. While the wall was building, and afterwards, several of the nobles of Judah were in the interest of Tobiah, and held a traitorous correspondence with him: some of them, having joined affinity with him, had engaged others to swear to serve him, as they had opportunity. Nay, they had the confidence, or rather insolence, to report the good deeds, or supposed excellent endowments, of this bitter enemy of God and his people, to Nehemiah; either intimating to him that he ought to imitate them, or to form an alliance with so worthy a character! And at the same time they betrayed Nehemiah's measures to him. But this pious and excellent man, who had so strenuously pleaded the cause of the oppressed poor, would not, in his present circumstances, exercise the authority, with which he was invested, against his own enemies in Judah, however basely they acted towards him; but persevered in serving his people, notwithstanding their treachery and ingratitude!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—9.

The whole power and policy of Satan and his servants have always been directed against those, who zealously seek the welfare of the church of God: and though often baffled, they are unwearied in their projects.—The rage of persecutors, though terrible, is not so dangerous as the professed friendship of concealed enemies: so that except there is good evidence that men, who have opposed the cause of God, have truly repented, and been reconciled to him, they cannot safely be trusted, when they court the favor of his people, but should rather be suspected of some mischievous design. (Notes and P. O. Ezra 4:1—6. Notes, Acts 9:10—16,23—30.) If we received no other damage from their insincere friendship, we should be taken off from our work to no purpose: we should not then suffer ourselves to be overcome by importunity; for we had better offend man by a refusal, than sin against God by compliance.—Even our common lawful business ought to have a decided preference to all matters of mere compliment: how much more then our peculiar duties as Christians, magistrates, or ministers of religion, in proportion to their importance and difficulty!—It is desirable to be constantly engaged in some useful employ; among other reasons, that we may have an answer ready for those invitations and proposals, which we cannot profitably accept, and scarcely know how to refuse. The active servant of God, may, on any such occasion, say, "I am doing a great work, so that I cannot come down; why should the work cease, while I leave it, and come down to you?" And this is enough, as a reason for avoiding those circles, where no good can be got or done; and which interfere with the duties of the closet and the family, and prevent the redeeming of our time and the improvement of our talents.—The deceitful smiles of the world frequently form our first temptation in the path of duty. But if we stedfastly withstand them, and will not be diverted from our work; we must prepare for reproaches, slanders, and menaces, from the same quarter. Our firmness will be called obstinacy; our zeal, rashness; and our activity, ambition: nay, we shall be warned, that we are about to affront all our friends, and turn them into enemies; and to bring ourselves into dangers and difficulties, from which we cannot extricate ourselves, unless we follow other counsels, and act more circumspectly.—The zealous servants of God have also, in every age and place, been unjustly traduced, as rebellious to the ruling powers: and their malicious enemies have often represented their own slanders, as the general sentiments of mankind. (Notes, Ezra 4:11—24. P. O. 7—24.) These misrepresentations tend to weaken the hands of the courageous; and they prejudice, alarm, and draw off such as were helpful to their pious designs. But a clear conscience, a lively faith, an assured persuasion that we are doing our duty, and a zeal for the honor of God, will carry us above all discouragements: and, being satisfied with denying the charges brought against us, it is best to persevere in our proper employment, without wasting time in altercations or self-vindication; only lifting up our prayer to God to "strengthen our hands," and encourage our hearts.

V. 10—19.

A thousand slanders will die away, one after another; while the malice of their authors will be exposed: but one real crime sometimes leaves an indelible stain upon a man's character, and obstructs his future usefulness: let us then fear the least sin far more than any calumny. But those temptations are the most dangerous, which come from professed servants of God, and our own friends. When persons of this description, with apparent piety and affection, counsel the zealous to be more moderate and cautious, the diligent "to spare himself," and the bold, to take care of himself; the insinuation has great effect. Our appeal, however, in this case, must be to the word of God. (Notes, 1 Kings 22:13,14. Matt. 16:21—23.) That cannot be from him, let who will speak it, which contradicts his plain precept or truth; or which would induce us to neglect our duty, or prefer our own ease, emolument, credit, liberty, or life, to his glory and the welfare of his church; or which would persuade us to shrink from the cross, or refuse self-denial. Many such counsellors are in the pay of the enemy: for, being induced to time-serving in their own case, from interested motives, they consider the conduct of the more zealous as a reproach, and want to be kept in countenance by their example: and if we knew from what motives grave advice is sometimes given, we should understand from what quarter it came, without further information. We need not always, however, judge the adviser; but we ought in all cases, to try and prove the advice, and without scruple to reject all that is contrary to the word of God. Every man should also study consistency with his profession, former character, station, and engagements. That which is allowable in one man, may be very improper in another: and we ought to venture any thing in a good cause, trusting in the Lord, and committing ourselves to his protection. It is therefore useful frequently to inquire, 'Should such a man as I do so and so? Should I, who am a Christian, a saint, a child of God, a member of Christ, a 'temple of the Holy Spirit, a ransomed sinner, 'an heir of heaven; one set up to be "a light in 'the world," and "the salt of the earth," a 'preacher of righteousness, and "a steward of 'the mysteries of God;" should I even appear to 'be covetous, or sensual, or proud, or envious? 'Should I yield to impatience, discontent, or 'anger? Should I be slothful, unbelieving, or un-'merciful and unkind? What effects will such 'conduct in me have upon others? Will not some 'be grieved, many misled and prejudiced; oth-'ers emboldened in ungodliness and enmity to 'the truth? Will not this prevent the effect of my 'exhortations or persuasions, in my family, among 'my connexions, or from the pulpit?' Thus, all that God has done for us, or by us, may become an argument for watchfulness, diligence, self-denial, and perseverance.—It is also peculiarly instructive to consider, how others in similar circumstances would act. 'Would Peter or 'Paul have done so, to save their money, to in-'dulge their sloth or pride, to escape a cross, a 'prison, or death? Do even the men of the world 'suffer themselves so easily to be diverted from 'their object, by every appearance of difficulty 'or peril.'—In all cases indeed they, who would lead others in arduous services, must share the danger and the hardship: and this is the reason, why the enemy of souls employs so many instruments, and forms so many projects, to discourage, or bring a reproach on, the active servants of God. If the shepherd can be frighted away, the flock will be scattered.—Every success of the gospel discourages the enemies of God: and they sometimes perceive that it is his work, and yet hate it the more on that very account: but false brethren are the severest trial to the faithful servants of God. "They who forsake the law praise the wicked:" (Note, Prov. 28:4.) and those who form marriages with the avowed opposers of the gospel, will probably soon join their party, notwithstanding their present pretensions. Many leading men, yea, preachers and prophets in the visible church of God, will be found "workers of iniquity." But under every discouragement, we should "consider Jesus, who endured the contradiction of sinners against himself, lest we be weary, and faint in our mind;" and who "laid down his life for his sheep;" that after his example we may persevere in our duty, amidst every danger and opposition, not being overcome by the treachery, ingratitude, or perverseness of those around us, but still endeavoring to "overcome evil with good:" and "in due season we shall reap, if we faint not."

V. 2, 3. It has been supposed by some learned men, that Nehemiah, having finished the wall, and made other needful regulations, returned to the Persian court; but that he not long after came again to Jerusalem with a new commission: and that on this occasion he placed his brother Hanani, and Hananiah over the city, and gave them instructions how to manage in his absence. The charge, however, here given, and the service required, would be necessary even when Nehemiah resided at Jerusalem: for he could not superintend the gates and the watchmen, without being taken off from other important and numerous engagements. Doubtless Hanani was a proper person, or else Nehemiah would not have preferred him to this important trust; and his journey to Shushan, if it indeed took place, may be supposed to have been undertaken out of a zealous regard to his people and his religion: (Note, 1:2.) but of Hananiah it is expressly said, that "he was a faithful man, and feared God above many." (Notes, 5:14—18. 1 Kings 18:3,12—16. Ps. 101:6.) —'At night he charges them to stand by, and see 'the gates shut and barred in their presence.' Bp. Patrick.—Ruler of the palace. (2) 'So the house, 'where Nehemiah dwelt is called, because he was governor for the king, and a kind of Viceroy, who did all the king's business, and here, gave audience to the people, as the king was wont 'to do in his palace.' Bp. Patrick. (Note, 2:8.)

V. 4. The walls had been built upon their old foundations, in confidence that God in due time would replenish the city: but there were only a small number of inhabitants, compared with those of former ages; so that large spaces remained unoccupied. This would render it the more requisite that a strict watch should be kept, lest their enemies should scale the walls unobserved: and on the same account it was absolutely necessary, that proper measures should be adopted for replenishing the city with inhabitants.

V. 5, 6. This account was taken of the people, in order to bring the tenth part of them to reside in Jerusalem; (Note, 11:1,2.) and as it proved an useful measure, Nehemiah piously and reasonably ascribed the first thought of it to God, who "put it into his heart." (Marg. Ref.—Note, Jam. 1:16—18.) In conducting this business, he found the register of those who came up with Zerubbabel; which is here inserted nearly as we had it before. (Notes, Ezra 2:1—67.) 'Nehe-'miah found that list of those who came up in the 'first of Cyrus, as it was taken then: and ... he 'called over the names of the families, as they lay 'in order there: ... but he took the number of 'them, as they were now when he numbered 'them. Some families were now more in number 'than they were when that first was made, some 'were less; and some that were in that list, were 'not to be found now. ... Some ... had come from 'Babel; some ... were now gone back.' Lightfoot, as quoted by Bp. Patrick.—As however, the greatest part of the families consist of exactly the same number in both places; and the sum total in each, with several other particulars, entirely coincides; it can hardly be conceived, that almost a hundred years should have made no greater changes.—Should any, however, conjecture, that some ancient copyist had inserted the wrong

CHAP. VIII.

The people being assembled, Ezra, with solemn worship, reads and expounds the law, 1—8. The people are greatly affected: but Nehemiah, Ezra, and the Levites, exhort them to joy in God, to cheerful feasting, and to liberality towards the poor, 9—12. Being instructed from the law concerning the feast o tabernacles, they keep it with great solemnity, 13—18.

V. 70—72. This seems to have been a distinct oblation from that recorded in Ezra: (Note, Ezra 2:68—70.) and was probably made, after the people were registered by Nehemiah, who was the Tirshatha or governor at this time, as Zerubbabel had been at the first return of the Jews from captivity. The principal persons also concurred with him liberally, according to their ability.

V. 73. This verse so accords with the last verse of the second of Ezra, and the first of the third, that it is doubtful whether it should be understood of the Jews, who returned under Zerubbabel; or of what followed after Nehemiah had registered them. If it be taken in the latter sense; and if the events next recorded took place in the same year with the building of the wall, as probably they did, there could be no time for Nehemiah to go to Babylon: (Note, 2,3.) for the wall was not finished till the twenty-fifth day of Elul, or the sixth month. (6:15.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The active servants of God, and of his church, will never want employment; for the completion of one design will make way for the commencement of another.—The fear of God, powerfully possessing the heart, produces proportionable fidelity and conscientiousness, in a man's whole character and conduct: and it is happy for the community, when men of this character have the charge of public affairs.—"Except the LORD keep the city," the walls are built, and "the watchmen wake, in vain:" yet in this and all other concerns, God is to be trusted in the use of prudent and proper means, and not to be tempted by the neglect of them. (Note, Ps. 127:1. P. O. Matt. 4:5—7.)—Magistrates and ministers have more extensive charges than others: but every man ought to watch over his own heart, and his own house, that sin, the worst enemy, may be kept at a distance, as much as possible.—Provision is made in the gospel, and in the city of our God, for immensely greater numbers than have yet been enrolled citizens: we should therefore be devising means for replenishing it with inhabitants, as well as for building its walls.—'All holy desires, 'all good counsels, and all just works are from 'God:' to him belongs the praise: when good thoughts are suggested; we should be careful not to "quench the Spirit," by rejecting them; (Note, 1 Thes. 5:16—22, v. 19.) and we ought continually to pray, that our God would put more and more of them into our hearts, and enable us to bring them to good effect; and that he would do the same for increasing numbers. Then we might hope that many would concur in designs, as yet scarcely thought of, for propagating the gospel and promoting the salvation of souls.—The Lord delights to honor those, who willingly face danger, and endure hardship for his sake: and he knows the names of all his people, and will produce the register at last. But woe be to those, who turn back from him, loving this present world: and happy they, who willingly come to dedicate themselves, and consecrate their substance to his service and glory!

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1, 2. The feast of trumpets was observed on the first day of the seventh month; and the people assembled to celebrate it, though not explicitly required. (Note, Lev. 23:24,25.)—It is probable, that Nehemiah, having formed a plan for their instruction from the law, called on them by this early attendance to concur in it. Doubtless the appointed sacrifices were offered; (Note, Num. 29:1—6.) but the courts of the temple not being so spacious or convenient, the congregation assembled in a broad street of the city, to hear the law read and expounded: and not only the women, but even the children who were capable of understanding, attended. Accordingly Ezra the priest, being a learned and ready scribe, having long been bestowing much pains on the sacred scriptures, and preparing correct copies of them, was called upon to take the lead in this service: and, though it does not appear that the measure originated with him, yet he most cordially concurred in it. (Note, Ezra 7:6—10.) Some conjecture that Ezra had been at Babylon, during the preceding events, in which he is not mentioned; and that he had lately returned: but perhaps he had been privately occupied in his own line for the good of the people, and was well satisfied to leave public affairs entirely to Nehemiah. (Note, 1 Sam. 12:23.)

V. 3. The reading and expounding continued about six hours, from "the light," (marg.) till noon; and as most of the people must have stood in the open air during a great part of the time, it appears that they were not soon wearied. (Notes, 9:3. Acts 20:7—12. 28:23—29.) Indeed "the ears of all the people were unto the book of the law;" or hearkening to it with profound attention. (Notes, Luke 19:45—48, v. 48. Heb. 2:2—4.)

V. 4. "Ezra the scribe stood upon a pulpit of wood," 'to raise him higher than the people, 'that he might be the better seen and heard by 'them all: whence in the Hebrew, it is called a 'tower of wood; but was not like our pulpits, ... 'but large and long, that many persons might 'stand in it, as appears by what follows.' Bp. Patrick. Beside, &c.] Some suppose that these persons, being priests or Levites under Ezra's direction, assisted by turns in the service, to prevent his being worn down with it: but others think, that they were principal persons who thus shewed their concurrence, by standing on his right hand and on his left; or that they were priests or Levites preparing for the same service on future occasions. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5, 6. Ezra, having reverently opened the sacred volume; before he began to read first "blessed the LORD, the great God:" he gave him thanks for the good gift of his holy law, and for all his mercies; he adored his great and glorious Majesty; and he implored his blessing on the service before him. To this the people gave a cordial and repeated assent; and, prostrating themselves on the ground, added their most solemn worship. This was an excellent preparation for a due regard to the sacred scriptures; and the example should be imitated by those who preach and expound, or read and hear the word of God.

V. 7. The persons, mentioned in this verse, must not be confounded with those who stood by Ezra, in his pulpit, or tower: for only one of the same name occurs in both places; and, no doubt, in that instance, different men of the same name were meant. The persons here mentioned were most of them, if not all, priests and Levites: (Marg. Ref.) and as they "caused the people to understand the law," and were not in the pulpit with Ezra; and as it can hardly be supposed, that he merely read, and that they expounded what he read: it is not unlikely, that they had separate audiences in different places, where they read and expounded the law, as Ezra did in the station assigned him: for one man's voice could not reach so great a multitude. (Note, Acts 2:14—21, v. 14.) Perhaps different orders and descriptions of persons formed separate circles: and therefore it is added, that "the people stood in their place," as it had been appointed to each of them. "The people stood in their place," 'listening both to 'what was read, and what was delivered as the 'explication of it.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 8. It is here said, "So they read, &c." which confirms the preceding supposition, there being evidently more than one reader.—The persons engaged in this service read the text distinctly, and then gave the interpretation: thus the meaning was declared to the people, with all plainness, and application to their present circumstances and conduct, for their conviction and instruction. This seems the obvious meaning of the passage. Some learned men, however, suppose, that the Jews had forgotten the Hebrew, during the captivity; and that the expositors merely rendered what was read into Chaldee. 'But if this were true, why did the prophets write 'in Hebrew after their return from captivity? and 'this very book shews the contrary, (13:23,24.) 'where the Jews' language appears to have been 'spoken by the people.' Bp. Patrick. The opinion indeed is grounded chiefly on Jewish traditions, and customs introduced in later ages, and has no support in the scriptures themselves.

V. 9. The people, when the law of God was read and explained to them, were convinced of their guilt and danger; and, with tender consciences and broken hearts, mourned for their transgressions. (Notes, 2 Kings 22:8—11, v. 11. Rom. 3:19,20. 7:9—12. Gal. 2:17—21, v. 19.) This was indeed a proper and highly beneficial effect of that service: but as it was a holy festival, which the Lord would have kept with joy and gladness, they were instructed by their teachers to repress their grief, and to turn their thoughts to the mercy of God, and to hope and rejoice in him.—"The Levites," as well as Ezra, "taught the people." (Notes, 2 Chr. 17:7—9. 30:21,22. v. 22. 35:1—3, v. 3.)

V. 10, 11. After the former part of the day had been spent in the ordinances of religion, the people were allowed, and even required, (probably by a public notice from Nehemiah, enforced by the priests and Levites,) to spend the remainder in cheerful feasting, as a representation of the believer's joy in the service of his gracious God. (Notes, Deut. 12:5—7. Ec. 3:1—11.) It is probable that peace-offerings had been offered, and they were now called to feast together on them; and might lawfully drink the sweet, or rich, wines, which their vineyards produced, in as liberal a manner as consisted with temperance. But then they must remember to send portions to those for whom nothing had been prepared; to the poor, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow. (Deut. 12:12,18,19. P. O.) For this would distinguish their religious feasting from the sensual indulgence of carnal men, and complete the due solemnization of the holy day. They were also again reminded, not to indulge grief, on the present festival; (Note, 1,2.) "for the joy of the LORD was their strength." A grateful, adoring recollection of his late mercies, and his ancient distinguished favors to the nation, and powerful interposition in their behalf; with cheerful meditation on his promises and perfections, inspiring confidence, love, and zeal, and leading them to abound in joyful praises and thanksgivings; would fortify their souls to meet the dangers, encounter the difficulties, resist the temptations, and perform the duties, which still lay before them. Whereas, indulged sorrow would induce desponding fear, enfeeble their resolutions, and unfit them for labors, trials, and conflicts. (Notes, Ps. 28:6—8. Prov. 15:13. Is. 12:1—3. 35:3,4. 2 Cor. 2:5—11. Phil. 4:4—7.) 'What Nehemiah had said to as many as 'could hear him, the Levites said to the rest of 'the people; going about, and persuading them to 'lay aside their heaviness, and make it a good 'day.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 12. The people in general had not only understood from the law, the will of God and their own sinfulness, but they had learned, in some degree, the grounds of holy rejoicing in the Lord: and having begun by sowing in tears, they soon were enabled to reap in joy. (Note, Ps. 126:5,6.) 'This was an extraordinary reason for 'their mirth, that they were illuminated in divine 'knowledge, and understood the will of God 'better than they did before.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 13. This was no festival; but, having profited from the word the day before, the people were desirous to be further instructed: and the chief of the fathers, priests, and Levites were the most forward to request Ezra, to favor th m with an exposition of some other part of the law, being convinced of his superior knowledge in it.

It may be supposed, that Ezra selected those portions of the law, which prescribed solemnities to be observed in the seventh month; especially the feast of tabernacles, as it had not in general been duly observed, and the season was approaching for it. (Note, Jam. 1:22—25.)

V. 17. It is evident that this and the other solemn feasts were totally neglected, at some times, and for a long while together: yet a few instances occur of the feast of tabernacles being kept; and these words must therefore be understood, of the exactness, unanimity, and joyfulness, with which it was at this time celebrated. (Notes, 1 Kings 8:63—65. Ezra 3:4.) Patrick.* (Notes, 1 Kings 8:66. 2 Chr. 30:26,27.)

V. 18. The reading of the law every seventh year at the feast of tabernacles had been enjoined by Moses; but it seems not in general to have been duly attended to: at this time, however, it formed a part of the daily service, through the whole continuance of the feast. (Note, Deut. 31:10—13.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

Pious men of different dispositions may serve the church in their several ways. The studious may, as it were, prepare materials with which the active may work: and the active may make way for the studious, to bring forth their treasures for public use. They ought therefore reciprocally to assist each other; and to welcome such assistance, without envy, competition, or prejudice.—The public reading, expounding, and preaching of God's word has, in all ages, been the grand method of promoting true religion: they, therefore, who are eminently capable of this service, should be called forth from obscurity and retirement, and excited and encouraged to abound in it; all, of every age, sex, or rank, who are capable of understanding, should assemble to attend, and all ought to "give earnest heed to the things which they hear." (Note, 2 Chr. 17:7—9. P. O. 7—19.) Those who are in reputation should set an example of diligence in this respect, and even teachers should be "swift to hear" other ministers, especially younger ministers their approved seniors, as they have opportunity, that they may become more competent for the service.—When the value of the scriptures, and of the immortal soul, is properly understood; and when we are earnestly engaged, and in a spiritual frame of mind; we shall not soon be weary of divine ordinances. Short sermons, therefore, or tired hearers, prove a very low state of religion: for facts demonstrate, that where the word of God is precious, even inconvenient situations and uneasy postures will be patiently endured: and when ministers, who are themselves in earnest, perceive the people thirsting for instruction, and drinking it in, they will be encouraged to proceed, and to preach as much and as often as required, so long as God gives them health for the work.—Reading and preaching should be attended with solemn worship: the perfections of our God are worthy of all adoration; his mercies call for our most grateful acknowledgment; and a sense of our own wants and unworthiness, love to his people, compassion for sinners, and regard to all orders of mankind, where they prevail, will dictate many prayers and supplications. In these services one person must speak, but all should join in their hearts, and express their solemn and cordial assent.—We cannot too humbly or reverently worship "the LORD, the great God:" yet, blessed be his name, we may call him Father, in filial confidence and hope.—Whenever we open the sacred volume, we should bless the Lord for that precious gift, and proceed to peruse it, with entire submission to his teaching and authority.—Ministers should endeavor to make it evident to every one, that they preach according to these sacred oracles; producing clear scriptural warrant for all their doctrine; reading the word distinctly; diligently causing the people to understand it, by familiar explanations and illustrations; and applying it in the most plain and simple manner to their hearts and consciences.

V. 9—18.

The divine law, when faithfully unfolded, in its extensive demands and righteous sanction, is generally made successful by the Holy Spirit, in bringing the stout, hard, and proud hearts of sinners to tremble, to melt into godly sorrow, and to become abased before God. For it pierces the conscience, fills the soul with dismay, and thus prepares for the sweet consolations of the gospel, by which is "the knowledge of salvation, through the remission of sins." Thus the broken heart is bound up, and the sinner learns to rejoice in God our Savior.—Both godly sorrow and holy joy are profitable, and beautiful in their season: and it is peculiarly desirable to have all our passions regulated according to the will of God, and the duty of the present occasion. Those who mourn for sin should be comforted, instructed, and directed to rejoice in the Lord. This they have abundant reason to do, however many their sins have been, when they humbly come to trust in his mercy. His salvation is perfectly free; the provisions of his grace are plenteous; "his righteousness is for ever;" his "ways are pleasantness;" his protection sure; his consolations strong; and "hope" in his mercy and of his glory "maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost." (Note, Rom. 5:3—5.) Joy in God, if genuine, adds strength and courage to the soul for every duty and for every trial; it inspires resolution for service, and vigor in resisting temptation; it satisfies, and sanctifies, and enlarges the heart in cheerful obedience, and in love to our brethren. Indeed, that joy is a mere counterfeit, which has not these effects: and they are enemies to their own sanctification, who always indulge sorrow, even for sin, and put from them those consolations, which are tendered to them by the word and Spirit of God.—It is consistent with godliness, cheerfully and moderately to use the comforts of Providence; when they are received with thanksgiving, and "sanctified by the word of God and prayer," and by liberally communicating to the poor and needy. But those who "eat the fat and drink the sweet;" and send no portion, or only scanty pittances, to those for whom nothing is prepared; have not this sanctified enjoyment of their abundance. This especially distinguishes a Christian feast, from the revellings and banquetings, which are ranked by the apostle with abominable idolatries. (Note, 1 Pet. 4:3—5.)—Whatever causes a believer to rejoice, should excite him to abound in thanksgivings to God, and liberality to the poor. But his joy will not so much arise from worldly prosperity or indulgence, as from having understood the words of God, and from perceiving that sinners may hope in his mercy, and exult in the prospect of eternal glory.—Those, who have profited by the word of God, will be glad of an opportunity of hearing it on any day, as far as consistent with other duties: and when the people are so disposed, the minister is called to be "instant in season and out of season."—Some portions of scripture are more suitable to the circumstances of our congregations than others would be, especially when they remind them of present duty. For even true Christians neglect many things, through ignorance and forgetfulness, and for want of particular instructions. But it is admirable, when they no sooner hear the command of God, than they prepare for obedience; when attending on the word excites an increasing appetite for it; and when the ordinances afford great gladness to their souls. —Yet, alas, how little have the commandments and institutions of our God been hitherto observed, even among his professed worshippers! So that when individuals, or collective bodies, come near the standard of his word, in the power of godliness, they become "men wondered at." But though none, from age to age, or through whole nations of professed Christians, have ever served God, as some small company may aim to do; yet if these be evidently obeying the plain meaning of scripture, they ought not to be censured as singular, precise, or affected; but to be commended and imitated.—True religion will make us strangers and pilgrims upon earth: and those who refuse conformity to the world, and have their conversation in heaven, and their joy in the Lord, must appear strange and uncouth in the eyes of the servants of that other master, who "worketh in all the children of disobedience."

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1. No doubt the day of atonement, on the tenth day of the seventh month, had been duly observed: the feast of tabernacles lasted from the fifteenth to the twenty-second day of it; (Notes, Lev. 16:29—31. 23:26—43.) and then, only one day having intervened, the people kept a solemn fast, with every customary expression of godly sorrow and humiliation. This seems to have been done, not only by the authority of the governor, but by the general approbation of the people; who, by hearing the law read and expounded, had discovered their own numerous and heinous transgressions, with those of their fathers, and of the nation in preceding ages: (Notes, 8:9—13.) and it was intended as an introduction to their solemn covenanting with God, as afterwards recorded. (Notes, 38. 10:1.) It is probable that Nehemiah had formed the plan of this from the beginning of these solemnities, and had consulted with Ezra, and other principal persons, about the best method of accomplishing his purpose; which he accordingly did with their hearty concurrence.

V. 2. Before the appointed fast began, the Israelites carefully separated from among them those strangers, or Gentiles, who either by marriage or amity were intermingled with them. This was intended as a preparation for the solemn observance: for it seems that the people had again intermarried with the surrounding nations, after Ezra had separated them from their heathen wives. (Notes, Ezra 10:)

V. 3. The persons afterwards mentioned, (4, 5.) stood up to perform the services of the day; and they spent "one fourth" of it in reading the law, (probably expounding it also, as in the former instances, Notes, 8:1—8.) and "one fourth" in confessing their sins, and in other acts of solemn worship.—Some think that six hours, (a fourth part of the twenty-four,) were at once spent in each of these sacred duties. Others suppose, that 'they read the law, and confessed, (that is, praised 'God, 5.) interchangeably. For in one fourth 'part of the day, from the first hour to the third, 'they did the one; and from thence to the sixth 'hour, (that is, till twelve o'clock,) they did the 'other. Then they began the former again, till 'the ninth hour; and from thence to the evening 'they spent their time in the other.' Bp. Patrick. —Perhaps the three hours previous to the offering of the morning-sacrifice, were assigned for the people to prepare themselves and their families for the public solemnity; and the three hours after the evening-sacrifice, for their consenting to the covenant and sealing it, and the improvement of what they had heard, by meditation, pious converse, and devotion: for on solemn fasts it was customary for the Jews to take no food till after sun-set. The public services of the day, however, continued at least six hours without intermission.

V. 4. It is probable, that these Levites were placed at proper distances, (so as not to interfere with each other, when they "cried with a loud voice unto the LORD their God,") upon pulpits, or scaffolds, erected for that purpose, with distinct auditories around them. (Notes, 8:4,7. Acts 2:14—21, v. 14.)

V. 5. Eight Levites are mentioned both in this verse and the preceding, and five of the names are the same: it may therefore be supposed, that the same persons are intended, of whom some were known by different names, though some think, that another company is spoken of. —Perhaps the people were prostrate on the ground, or kneeling, while they humbly confessed their sins, and craved mercy from God, each for himself, and for his people: but they were called upon to "stand up," when the public adorations began; and to bless and "praise the LORD their God for ever and ever;" or as long as they had any being; or, to bless him, as "their God for ever and ever." He indeed is "exalted above all blessing and praise." His essential glory is incomprehensible and infinite; so that the most sublime adorations of the highest created beings must fall unspeakably below his majesty and excellency. (Notes, 1 Chr. 29:10—19. Ps. 106:2.) Yet he accepts their adorations and thanksgivings, when they worship him according to their capacities. Nay, he delights in the feeble praises and blessings of sinners, when they come before him in humble faith and cordial grateful love; and counts himself glorified by them, though the best of them are not only defective, but defiled! 'Here follows a compendious history of 'the affairs of the Hebrew nation, in this confes-'sion of God's benefits and their ingratitude; 'which Nehemiah and Ezra, it is likely, compos-'ed in the form of a prayer, and delivered it to the 'Levites, whom they ordered to speak it distinct-'ly before the whole congregation, from their 'several scaffolds, which were conveniently plac-'ed in several parts of the assembly, that they 'might be heard.' Bp. Patrick.—As at least three hours were employed in this part of the service, far more must have been spoken than is here written; which seems to have been a kind of compendium, or directory, to those who officiated, that all might be evidently of one mind; on the several parts of which, it is probable, each of them enlarged according to his ability. V. 8. The Lord tried the faith of Abraham on many occasions; especially when he commanded him to offer up Isaac: and "he found his heart faithful." Abraham stood every trial, and was fully approved. God also shewed himself righteous towards Abraham and his posterity; both in faithfully performing his covenant-engagements,

The judgments (or judicial law, the rule of the magistrate,) given to Israel, were more consistent with the true difference between right and wrong, and the relative proportion of crimes and punishments, than the municipal laws of any other country in any age hitherto have been: (Note, Ex. 21:1.) and the ritual law prefigured the true way of a sinner's justification, sanctification, and obtaining eternal life. V. 20. The Spirit of prophecy, in Moses, Joshua, the seventy elders, and the subsequent prophets, both instructed the Israelites by their ministry, and testified against them when rebellious. (30) The example, conversation, and exertions of those who partook of his sanctifying influences, tended to reform the nation: and no doubt, the Spirit of God, by his convictions, powerfully excited, in the consciences of the unconverted, a sense of guilt and dread of punishment; and in other ways strove with them. But in all these respects "they resisted the Holy Ghost." (*Marg. 23 Their children also [y] multipliedst thou, as the stars of heaven, and [z] broughtest them into the land, concerning which [a] thou hadst promised to their fathers, that they should go in to possess it.

24 So the children went in and possessed the land, and [b] thou subduedst before them the inhabitants of the land, the Canaanites, and gavest them into their hands, with their kings, and the people of the land, that they might do with them [*] as they would.

25 And they took [c] strong cities, and [d] a fat land, and possessed houses full of all goods, [†] wells digged, vineyards, and olive-yards, and [‡] fruit-trees in abundance: so they [e] did eat, and were filled, and became fat, and [f] delighted themselves in thy great goodness.

26 Nevertheless [g] they were disobedient, and rebelled against thee, and [h] cast thy law behind their backs, and [i] slew thy prophets, which testified against them to turn them to thee, and [k] they wrought great provocations.

27 Therefore [l] thou deliveredst them into the hand of their enemies, who vexed them: and [m] in the time of their trouble, when they cried unto thee, thou heardest them from heaven; and according to thy manifold mercies, thou gavest them [n] saviors, who saved them out of the hand of their enemies.

28 But after they had rest, they [§] did evil again before thee: therefore leftest thou them in the hand of their enemies, so that they had the dominion over them; yet when they returned, and cried unto thee, thou [o] heardest them from heaven, and [p] many times didst thou deliver them, according to thy mercies;

29 And [q] testifiedst against them that thou mightest bring them again unto thy law: [r] yet they dealt proudly, and hearkened not unto thy commandments, but sinned against thy judgments, ([s] which if a man do, he shall live in them,) and [||] withdrew the shoulder, [t] and hardened their neck, and would not hear.

30 Yet [u] many years didst thou [¶] forbear them and testifiedst against them [x] by thy Spirit in [] thy prophets; yet would they not give ear: [y] therefore gavest thou them into the hand of the people of the lands.

Some expositors think, that the situation of Canaan, as favorable to Israel's separation from other nations, being divided by seas, mountains, and deserts, from the most flourishing kingdoms in the world, was denoted by this expression. And indeed it is observable, that Jerusalem, which God chose for the metropolis of his people, was situated at a distance from the sea, and from all navigable rivers; and therefore could not become a place of extensive commerce.—Others, however, suppose, that the dispossessed nations are meant, who were driven into corners.—Heshbon being the city of Sihon, the word should be rendered, "even the land of the king of Heshbon." V. 36, 37. The situation of Israel was very different, at this time, from what it had been under their own kings, and in the days of their prosperity. God had for their sins set over them the kings of Persia, who exacted from them heavy taxes; and who had their property, liberty, and lives entirely in their power. (Note, John 8:30—36.) It was very distressing for the worshippers of God, to be in slavery to the worshippers of dumb idols: and though they had no intention of revolting from the kings of Persia, who allowed them to live according to their own laws, and in many respects shewed them much favor; yet they hoped, that, upon their deep repentance, and more entire return to God, he would more effectually deliver them from captivity and bondage, and restore them in due season to their former liberty, independence, and prosperity. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

The diligent study of God's word will more and more shew us both our own sinfulness, and the plenteousness of his salvation; and thus alternately call us to mourn for sin, and to rejoice in him. —Seasons of comfort should remind us of his condescending goodness, and so lead us to deeper self-abasement on account of our crimes against him: and thus joyful feasts and solemn fasts may properly succeed, and prepare our hearts for each other.—Our sorrow and humiliation for sin must be evidenced to be genuine by separation from it, and from every occasion or temptation to it.—Every discovery of the truth and will of God should endear to us his sacred word, and render us more unwearied in our attendance on it, and on his worship. A few hours, or even occasionally a whole day, cannot be too long to spend in those exercises and meditations, which are preparations for heaven, and anticipations of its sacred joys: yet alas, we are most of us sooner weary in the courts of the Lord, than the trifler is at his diversions, or even the laborer at his work!—Our God knoweth our thoughts before we speak, and mental prayer may suit our secret intercourse with him: but those who address him in public, should speak audibly and with animation; that the people may hear and be affected: and if, on some occasions, "they cry with a loud voice unto the LORD their God," or be more copious than usual, they cannot be censured, without involving those who are commended in the sacred scriptures.—Whether we feast and rejoice, or fast and mourn for sin, we should be ready to bless and praise the Lord our God for his eternal excellences; for his goodness to us as our Creator, and the sole Author of all our temporal comforts; and above all, "as the God of salvation," for the wonders which he has done for his church of redeemed sinners from the beginning hitherto.

V. 7—31.

In reviewing this abstract of the Lord's conduct toward Israel, as a people, from the choice and call of Abraham to the days of Nehemiah: we perceive a continued display of his power, wisdom, truth, and love, requited by persevering ingratitude, and perverse disobedience. All their distinguishing advantages originated from the Lord's choice of them; and accorded to his gracious promises, which he most faithfully performed. But while surrounded with the riches of his bounty, and the demonstrations of his power and presence; while his holy law yet sounded in their ears, Sinai's fiery top was before their eyes, and they were guided, guarded, sustained, and instructed by miracles; they rebelled against God, set up idols, attempted to return to Egypt, and rushed vehemently into the most daring provocations! Yet he did not destroy them, he withdrew not his mercies from them, he was ever ready to hear their prayers, to pardon their sins, and to do them good; though they still relapsed into murmurings, and provocations! The dealings of the Lord toward them, as a nation, in their warnings, corrections, and deliverances, throughout the whole history; and their ingratitude, perverseness, neglect of his worship, contempt and persecution of his prophets, relapses into idolatry and other enormities; tended to shew the riches of his goodness, forbearance, and long-suffering, and the hardness of their impenitent hearts. And even when at length justice demanded, that they should be given up into the hands of their enemies, and their temple, city, and country desolated; his tender mercy prevented him from utterly casting them off! their miseries were great and terrible; but the Lord was just in all that he had done: yea, it was of his mercies that they were not consumed, and that a remnant had been brought back to their own land; who soon began to shew the same spirit of unthankful and perverse disobedience.—And is not their conduct a specimen of human nature? Our land, for instance, has for ages been favored with deliverances, opportunities, and benefits, little, if at all, inferior to those vouchsafed to Israel: and have we not copied Israel's ingratitude, rebellion, and iniquity? Oh, may a general reformation, while yet we are spared, prevent our being given up into the hands of foreign conquerors, or domestic oppressors! (P. O. Deut. 32:15—35. Ps. 78:12—54. 106:28—48. Ez. 16: 20:10—19.)

But especially we should each of us study our own history. Let us look back to the time, when we received our being, as rational creatures, from the goodness and power of the Lord; let us recollect the distinguishing advantages of our infancy and childhood: then let us ask ourselves, what were our first returns to our kind Friend and Benefactor? what were our first thoughts, words, and works?—As our faculties began to unfold, revolving years brought with them recent comforts and advantages: and did they not witness increasing perverseness, ingratitude, and ungodliness? Let us divide our lives past into distinct periods, and carefully investigate the mercies and the transgressions of each, until we have brought down the inquiry to the present hour: praying all the while, that the Holy Spirit may assist our recollection, and enable us to form a proper estimate of the Lord's dealings with us, and our behavior towards him; and to deduce proper conclusions from the whole, with suitable affections. And if prejudice, ignorance, or self-flattery do not blind our minds, we shall certainly see abundant cause for deep humiliation and for admiring gratitude; and to acknowledge, that all our sufferings have been justly merited, all our comforts mercifully bestowed.—Besides the temporal provision which we have from the Lord's bounty, (though not by miracle;) we are favored with means and opportunities of becoming wise unto salvation, even beyond what Israel enjoyed in their most favored times. We have the sacred oracles, now completed and ever at hand, to give us light, and to shew us the way in which we should go. We have the Gospel preached among us, and the holy sabbaths and ordinances of our God: but have we never neglected, profaned, and despised them? We have not been without salutary chastisements, and merciful deliverances perhaps in answer to prayer: but have we not requited them by returning unto sin? We have had, not only the testimony of God's servants, but the strivings of his good Spirit: but have we never hated or despised the one, and quenched the other? nay, we are especially "under the ministration of the Spirit:" yet perhaps have neglected to pray for his gracious influences, and derided those who did! And have not we proudly cast off the authority of God's law; and as proudly endeavored to justify ourselves before him? This I say, was the case with us once, perhaps is so still with some who read these observations. Yet, whilst others have been cut off, we are spared! May this review of the Lord's mercies, and of our sins, bring us to true repentance, and induce us to condemn ourselves, as having imitated and vindicated all the transgressors who have gone before us: may it bring us to submit to the Lord's righteousness, to accept of his salvation, and to set our seal to his new covenant of mercy and grace: that "being delivered from all our enemies, we may serve him in righteousness before him" the remainder of our days. (P. O. Deut. 9: 32:1—14. Ps. 106:1—27. Ez. 20:1—9.)

Even, if by the Lord's choice of us, and his grace given to us, we have on the whole been made and found faithful to him; and if his covenant have been ratified to us with all its precious promises; we shall not only have cause to adore him for these inestimable mercies, and for his Son Jesus Christ, and redemption by his atoning blood, as the Foundation of them all; but we shall, upon every review, see cause to admire his present patience and gentleness, and to lament our ingratitude and disobedience. We have been delivered from a far worse oppression, than that of the Egyptian tyrant, and by a far more wonderful exertion of almighty power and love. We are guided by a superior light, sheltered by a more glorious protection, and favored with stronger consolations, than Israel of old. We feed upon "the Bread of life, which came down from heaven, to give life unto the world:" we drink the Waters which flow from "the Rock of ages" who was smitten for us; we are clothed with the robe of righteousness and salvation; our "feet are shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace;" and the good Spirit of God, is not only our condescending Instructer and Sanctifier, but our Comforter also, who deigns to make our hearts his temple! and we possess the hope and earnests of everlasting glory. But, while we rejoice in the Lord's great goodness to us, what requital do we make? We are, perhaps, kept from habitual and gross disobedience: but we are conscious how often we are setting up our idols, and in heart returning to our bondage; how often we forget him, "grieve his Holy Spirit," and neglect his service; and how often we are kept from still greater revolts by no higher motives than the terror of his judgments, and the anguish of his salutary chastisements, which yet we soon forget, when he has mercifully removed them. Were he not slow to anger and ready to pardon, he would have cast us off long ago. But our heavenly Advocate still pleads, and we are spared; and his mercies and our privileges are continued to us!

On every review of our past conduct we shall find cause to lie down ashamed before God; praising his great goodness, and confessing our great unworthiness. Let us then thank him for his merciful corrections, as well as his consolations: let us renew our acceptance of his salvation, and ratification of his covenant: let us beg of him to deliver us from all other lords, that we may serve him more entirely. And let us frequently meditate on these subjects, that we may be preserved humble, thankful, and watchful; as well as be prepared for communion with him in every sacred ordinance.—It behoves all men to reflect seriously and frequently on the greatness, justice, and goodness of the Lord; to consider the terrible power of his indignation, and the infinite value of his favor. And they should remember that pride, obstinacy, and impenitence are the sins which ruin the soul; and that no former crimes can ruin the penitent believer. Let then the sinner trust in the mercy of him, who is a God of pardons, and "ready to forgive;" let the backslider repent and return to him; let the believer walk humbly with him: let the prosperous fear abusing the Lord's goodness: let the afflicted be warned to seek deliverance from the wrath to come. Let us ever remember that all our miseries are the effect of sin, and that they are all less than we deserve, though hard for us to bear: let us then pray to be delivered from 'the bitter pains of eternal death;' and not forget to entreat the Lord to deliver his church from the oppression of every enemy, and to establish it in the beauty of holiness.

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1. We have several times read of the rulers, priests, and people solemnly covenanting before God, to renounce their transgressions and to adhere to his service. Such transactions were sometimes ratified with sacrifices, solemn oaths, and other expressions of the most entire consent to them: but this is the only instance met with of a covenant drawn up in writing, and ratified by the names and seals of the persons who consented to it. (Notes, 29. Ex. 24:3—11. Deut. 26:17—19. 29:10—15. Josh. 8:30—35. 24:14—27. 2 Kings 11:17—20. 23:3. 2 Chr. 15:12—15. Is. 44:3—5. P. O. 1—5.) No doubt this was devised, to render the transaction more affecting; and that the deed might remain as a durable testimony, under their own hands and seals, against those who violated it: the explicit ratification thus given would render the persons concerned more sensible of their obligations, and more afraid of transgression; it would fortify them against temptation, preserve them from forgetfulness, and be a constant argument for them to insist upon in cautioning, exhorting, or reproving each other.—The same uses may be made of those professions, and of that consent to the new covenant, which are virtually made in baptism, whether personal or that of our children; and in the Lord's supper; when those ordinances are duly explained and understood, administered and attended on. (Notes and P. O. Matt. 19:13—15. Note, 26:26—28. P. O. 26—35.)—To this covenant the chief persons alone set their names and seals; and Nehemiah the governor first.—Perhaps Zidkijah was one of the princes; but no other name is explicitly mentioned of that order.

V. 2—8. All the persons named in these verses were priests, and no doubt chief persons of that order.—It is observable that Eliashib, the high priest, is not found among those who sealed the covenant. And it is probable, that neither he nor his sons favored the measure. (Notes, 13:4,23—30.)—But it is more surprising, that the name of Ezra is wanting. There is no reason to think that he was absent; for he was at Jerusalem both before and after this transaction: (8:1—6. 12:36.) perhaps he was confined by sickness or infirmity; or the measure so entirely originated with him, and he had bestowed so much pains in drawing up the covenant, and inducing others to consent to it, that his further ratification of it was deemed superfluous. (Note, Dan. 3:8—12.)

V. 9—17. Most, if not all, of the Levites, who led the public devotions, set their seal to the covenant; which may be admitted as a probable indication, that they were earnestly and zealously engaged in that service. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 9:4,5.)

here mentioned, are found among those who returned with Zerubbabel, about ninety years before: so that, either the same names were preserved in the several families; or the principal descendants of these persons, when in general favorable to the measure, subscribed their family-name; that is, the name of that ancestor, by relation to whom they were commonly distinguished. (Luke 1:61.)

V. 28. (Marg. Ref.) 'All that did not sub-'scribe and seal, because they were too many, yet 'gave their consent to what the forenamed per-'sons did: and not only the men, but their wives 'and their children, who were arrived at years 'of discretion, engaged themselves.' Bp. Patrick. All they that had separated, &c.] It is probable, that these were the proselytes, who, having been circumcised, separated from their idolatrous connexions, and kept the law of Moses, and thus were numbered among the native Jews.

V. 29. By the nobles, in this place, the superior persons, priests, or Levites, are evidently meant. The body of the people, who were old enough to be capable of knowing what was intended, assembled together, and signified, by some appointed token, their consent to the covenant, as in the presence of God, and under the solemn obligations of an oath; and to an awful curse, which was denounced against such as violated these obligations. (Notes, 5:10—13. Deut. 27:15—26.) They engaged in general to obey the whole law of Moses: and some instances were specified, in which they had been remarkably guilty, or which were peculiarly ensnaring.

V. 30, 31. (Notes, Ezra 9: 10:)—It seems, that Nehemiah would not venture, in the present unsettled state of the Jews, to exercise his authority, to prevent their heathen neighbors from vending provisions at Jerusalem, or in the cities of Judah, on the sabbath: and he supposed, that by engaging the people, in this solemn manner, not to buy of them, they would be discouraged from coming. But he soon found that many evaded or violated the engagement, without regard to consequences; and he was afterwards constrained to employ coercive measures. (Notes, 13:15—22.)—It may be concluded from this narrative, that none of the Jews attempted to carry on trade on the sabbath; though some of them would buy of the Gentiles. This gave the latter an undue advantage, and proportionably injured the Jews. And certainly, carrying on trade is as contrary to the law of hallowing the sabbath, as any kind of labor whatever.

The exaction, &c. (31) Notes, 5:6—13. Lev. 25:1—7. Deut. 15:2,3. Matt. 18:23—35.

V. 32, 33. A half shekel apiece had been collected for erecting the tabernacle in the wilderness; and that sum is supposed to have been paid from time to time, for the purchase of sacrifices, and other expenses of the stated worship. (Notes, Ex. 30:11—16. 2 Kings 12:4,5. Matt. 17:24—27.) But it was now computed, that one third of a shekel apiece, or something less than a shilling of our money, annually, would suffice for these expenses. During prosperous times, the treasury of the temple, replenished by voluntary oblations, it is probable, supplied what was wanted; and on some occasions the liberality of kings and nobles rendered such contributions unnecessary: but the circumstances of the nation now required them.

V. 34. It is probable, that the wood for fuel had hitherto been provided for, out of the same fund with the sacrifices: but on this occasion it was deemed expedient to bear the expenses of it in another manner.—It seems each family engaged to send in a regular supply at an appointed time every year; and that the order was determined by lot.

35 And to bring [e] the first fruits of our ground, and the first fruits of all fruit of all trees, year by year, unto the house of the LORD:

36 Also [f] the first-born of our sons, and of our cattle, as it is written in the law, and the firstlings of our herds, and of our flocks, to bring to the house of our God, [g] unto the priests that minister in the house of our God:

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—29.

As the creatures and subjects of the Lord, we are bound by his authority to obey all his commandments, and are exposed to a tremendous curse for violating them. But our offended Sovereign, in his infinite mercy, has provided a better covenant, according to which believers are delivered from this curse, and are taught and enabled to perform a new, sincere, and acceptable obedience through Jesus Christ. The word of God calls us to consent to this covenant, and to partake of its inestimable benefits. And when we humble ourselves in godly sorrow and penitent confessions of sin; when we receive the atonement and reconciliation, which the Mediator of this covenant has made by his precious blood, and seek for mercy through his intercession by fervent prayers; and when in our purposes of renewed obedience, we rely on his gracious assistance:—when these transactions have indeed taken place in secret, between God and our souls; our public sealing and ratifying the covenant at the Lord's table, or in any other solemn way, will be honorable to God, edifying to his people, and encouraging to ourselves; and we may trust in him to enable us to fulfil the engagements with acceptance. But where this preparation of heart is wanting, such public engagements are mere hypocrisy. (P. O. Deut. 29:1—17. 2 Chr. 30:13—27.) This detestable evil will intrude in all great revivals of religion, after every possible precaution; and the hypocrites must be left to the judgment of a heart-searching God. But men should be warned, that those, who in baptism, or at the Lord's table, or when admitted into the ministry, or in any other way, engage for what they do not intend, or afterwards do not take care, to perform, bring themselves under an additional and most awful curse: as do all, who trifle with solemn oaths, vows, or sacramental engagements of any kind; and all, who despise, oppose, or pervert the salvation of the gospel.—Every one, capable of understanding, is alike required to obey the law of God; all need the mercy and grace of the gospel; all therefore should be exhorted and commanded, to set their seals to the new covenant: but those who have the pre-eminence in society, or take the lead in religious exercises, ought to set the example; and they, who are remarkably zealous to reform others, should be as remarkably zealous in every good work.—The influence and example of the great will always have a powerful effect upon their inferiors: their distinction is truly honorable, when, in following and cleaving to them, others follow and cleave to the Lord: and the Christian equality of the common people, as brethren to believing nobles and rulers, will influence them to render the more heartily "honor to whom honor is due." (Note, 1 Tim. 6:1—5.)

V. 30—39.

We are not sincere in covenanting with God, except we aim to obey all his commandments: for if we allow ourselves in violating one of them habitually, it is evident that we have not truly repented of our former transgressions in that particular; that we have never sought forgiveness of them in a due manner; that we do not desire the sanctifying Spirit of Christ, to mortify that peculiar sinful propensity: and consequently that we are not born of God, nor interested in the righteousness and atonement of Christ. But real believers, at least all, who by a consistent conduct give satisfactory evidence that they are such, place the strongest guard where there is the greatest danger; and use every means of avoiding and subduing those sins, which have the most foiled and ensnared them Separation from intimate connexions with ungodly persons, and the conscientious hallowing of the Lord's day, are peculiarly attended to by them. They do not infringe upon the sacred rest, and they shew a marked disapprobation of those who do: they carefully remove occasions of transgression, and previously so arrange every thing, as may best promote the strict observance of that holy day. Their attention to the ordinances of God is connected with justice to all men, and mercy to those who need it. They do not exact from their brethren, when it would distress them; but they trust the Lord to repay what they thus lose or expend. Though they be poor or burdened, they will find a little to spare for pious or charitable uses; that little will be accepted; and, coming from great numbers, will form large funds for useful purposes.—As the ordinances of God are the appointed means of sustenance to our souls, the believer should not grudge the expense of them. Even the poor will part with their money for bread: yet most men leave their souls to starve! But the covenanted servant of God "honors him with his substance and with the first fruits of all his increase," and that brings a blessing upon the rest: (Note, Prov. 3:9,10.) nor will he defraud or withhold from the ministers, who labor in the word and doctrine, their proportion of a suitable maintenance.—In short, we must render to God, to the king, to magistrates, superiors, equals, inferiors, relatives, the poor, and all men, that which is due unto them, according to the precepts of scripture; if we would evidence ourselves to be the true disciples of Christ, and, "adorn the doctrine of God our Savior:" and in these things we must persevere, exhorting one another, "not to forsake the house of our God," but to "walk before him in all his ordinances and commandments blameless."

NOTES.

CHAP. XI. V. 1, 2. Jerusalem at this time was not a place of trade, by which men could acquire wealth; the houses in general were not built; the adversaries of the Jews were peculiarly hostile to that city, both as the capital of the people, whose returning prosperity they envied, and the place of the holy worship which they hated: so that the cities of Judah, and other situations in the country, afforded a fairer prospect of living in peace, and of growing rich. It was therefore deemed a necessary policy, to replenish Jerusalem, for the re-establishment of the Jews as a distinct nation; and for the honor of the temple, and the protection of the priests and worshippers from the invasion of their enemies. It was "the holy city," as chosen, separated, and sanctified of God, for his immediate presence and instituted worship; as a type of Christ and even of heaven; and as the place, where the greatest advantages of becoming holy were enjoyed: yet the Jews, in general, had not sufficient zeal, or desire after spiritual improvement, to venture the consequences of removing thither. Some indeed willingly offered themselves to dwell there; whom their brethren commended, thanked, and prayed for; though few would imitate them. The rulers fixed their residence there, that the courts of justice, and the business connected with public affairs, might draw others: and, in addition to these inhabitants, one family in ten was expressly required to remove to Jerusalem; the selection of which was by lot referred to the determination of God. 'They cast lots, that among ten men, it might 'be known whom God chose to come thither. 'and the lot falling by divine appointment upon 'such a person rather than another; no doubt, he 'removed the more contentedly to this city.' Bp. Patrick. (Notes, Lev. 16:8—10. Prov. 16:33. Acts 1:23—26.)

V. 3. Israel, in this verse, seems to mean those of the ten tribes, who went up with the Jews. These were not required to dwell at Jerusalem, but inhabited the cities and villages allotted to them. The priests, Levites, Nethinims and the children of Solomon's servants likewise, were left at liberty when not attending at the temple. (Notes, 1 Chr. 9:2. Ezra 2:55—58. 7:24—26.)

V. 4—6. "Shiloni" (6) is supposed by some to mean Shelah, Judah's youngest, but only surviving son, by Shuah, the Canaanitess. (Marg. Ref. n.) If this supposition be well grounded, his descendants seem to have been included in the four hundred threescore and eight valiant men of Perez, or Pharez; that, being the principal branch of the tribe of Judah.—Many or most of these men of Judah seem to have offered themselves willingly to dwell at Jerusalem, in order to defend it: and probably they were, in general heads of families: yet the number from this principal tribe, appears to have been comparatively small. —In Chronicles, a larger number is stated: but it may be supposed, that the descendants of Zerah, (Judah's other son,) are also included, of whom no more than one is mentioned in this chapter. (24. Note, 1 Chr. 9:3—9.)

probable, the men of that tribe were most desirous of having it fully replenished.—Nearly twice as many of this tribe, (we may suppose, with their families,) dwelt there, as of Judah. (Note, 4—6.) The number does not exactly agree with that in the ninth of the first of Chronicles; though there can be no reasonable doubt that the same events are intended: but at this distance of time it cannot be supposed that such trivial variations can in all cases be accounted for; though the reason of them might be very evident to contemporaries.—From this time Jerusalem was progressively repeopled; so that it soon became very populous, and continued to be so, till destroyed by the Romans.—Joel was the principal commander of the Benjamites in Jerusalem: and Judah, or Hodaviah, (Marg. Ref. p,) was his deputy, or the next in authority under him.

V. 10—15. (Notes, 12:10—21. 1 Chr. 6:4—15.) Eliashib was high priest at this time, under whom it is probable Seraiah had the oversight of all the temple-service. (11) Some think the captain of the temple held the same office. The priests, mentioned in these verses, seem to have constantly resided at Jerusalem, by their own choice; besides those who attended by rotation. (Note, 3.)

V. 16. The outward business, &c.] (Note, 1 Chr. 26:29.) These persons seem to have had the charge of providing the sacrifices, and making all the other outward preparations for the worship, which the priests performed in the courts and in the sanctuary.

V. 17. (Note, 1 Chr. 9:12—18.) The time of the morning and evening-sacrifices were the principal hours of prayer to the Jews, who then resorted to the courts of the temple for their devotions.—These were, it seems, preceded by the solemn praises and thanksgivings, which the Levites rendered to the Lord with music and singing. Over this sacred service, Mattaniah, as precentor, statedly presided; while the others acted under his direction. Mattaniah was descended from Asaph; and the others were descendants of Jeduthun, chief singers in David's time. (Notes, 22,23. 1 Chr. 16:37—43. 25:1—7. 2 Chr. 5:12,13. 29:25—30.)

V. 19. The children of Akkub and Talmon are numbered with the porters which came up with Zerubbabel, at least ninety years before the events here recorded. In this and a few other instances of the same kind, it must be supposed, either that the children were called by the names of their fathers; or that, having distinct names of their own, they were also honored in their public characters, by the names of their more illustrious ancestors. (Note, 10:18—27.)

V. 22, 23. (Note, 17.) The descendants of Asaph, presided over some business relative to the temple and its repairs, at those times when not employed in psalmody. And they were appointed to this service, because, it seems, the king of Persia allowed those employed in singing the praises of God a daily stipend, besides their maintenance as Levites. (Notes, 1 Chr. 9:31—33, v. 33. Ezra 7:24—26.)

V. 24. (Note, 4—6.) Pethahiah, a descendant of Judah by Zerah, probably was the king's commissioner, who received the tribute, made all payments from it, and managed all such matters, according to orders from the king. It was an advantage to the Jews to have one of their own nation in this office: and it may be supposed he was preferred to it, through Nehemiah's recommendation.

V. 25—36. No account is given of those who dwelt in the cities and villages; but merely of the places which they inhabited. (Marg. Ref.) 'Some 'of these great towns, or cities without walls, had 'little villages about them; but others had only 'fields, and no villages in them, the country being 'as yet but thinly peopled. ... The rest of the Le-'vites, who were not settled at Jerusalem, were 'distributed among the people of Judah and Ben-'jamin, who dwelt in the forenamed towns, whom 'they taught and instructed in religion and good 'manners.' Bp. Patrick. (36.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It has in all ages been justly lamented, that men prefer their own ease and emolument to the public good; that even professed Christians too commonly "seek their own, and not the things of Jesus Christ;" and that but few have such an attachment to holy places and holy things, as to renounce their secular pleasures or advantages for the sake of them. Yet surely, where opportunities of spiritual improvement most abound, and where Jesus, the Ruler of our holy city, especially resides, there we should delight to dwell; in preference to all interests and connexions, and notwithstanding persecutions, tribulations, perils, and losses. Otherwise, where is our "meetness for the inheritance of the saints in light?" and how shall we be willing to depart hence, and be "absent from the body, that we may be present with the Lord?" For, to the carnally-minded, the perfect holiness of heaven, of its inhabitants, its employments, and its pleasures, and especially of that God who there unveils his glory, would be proportionably more intolerable, than the feeble beginnings of holiness in his church on earth, which excite their disgust, their weariness, and aversion.—The remnant who now willingly offer themselves to self-denying and perilous services, from love to the church, and zeal for the glory of God, shall in the event be distinguished with peculiar honor, and are now entitled to it from their brethren: indeed many will commend and wish them well, who, alas! have not courage to imitate them.—Our habitations are allotted us by the Lord himself; and we should not be hasty in changing them, though they be in some respects incommodious, especially if convenient for attendance on divine ordinances, and giving us opportunities of doing good.—In every station in life we should "study to be quiet, and to do our own business" with diligence; and, at all times, to cast our cares on God, and make our requests known unto him, by prayer with thanksgiving. We cannot be so afflicted, as not to have cause for gratitude; nor so prosperous, as to have no need of prayer: these duties should therefore be always united. (Notes, Phil. 4:5—7. 1 Thes. 5:16—22, v. 17,18.) And to this the ministers ought to stir up the people, not only by their exhortations, but by their example likewise.—As far as the Lord sees good, he makes even strangers to protect and provide for his servants. Let us then seek first his favor and his glory; let us study contentment, patience, and usefulness in our several stations; and wait in cheerful hope for an admission into the holy city of our God above.

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 1—6. It is evident that Ezra, here mentioned, was not Ezra the scribe, but a priest of the same name, who came up to Jerusalem long before with Zerubbabel. Several of the names are the same with those of the priests who sealed the covenant: (Marg. Ref.) but different persons must be intended; and it is evident, the same names were sometimes preserved in their families. (Notes, 10:18—27. 11:19.)

V. 7. "The chief of the priests" seem to have been the heads of the courses established by David; with the next in succession to the high priesthood, and the ruler or captain of the temple. Perhaps the twenty-four courses were not yet fully re-established. (Notes, 1 Chr. 24:6—10. Ezra 2:36—39.)

V. 8, 9. Note, 11:17.—Jeshua. (8) Marg. Ref. p.—In the watches. (9) It is probable, that some of the Levites, in succession, sang the praises of God in the sanctuary, during the watches of the night. (Note, Ps. 134:)

V. 10, 11. Jaddua is, by most expositors, supposed to have been high priest in the time of Alexander the great, and to have met that haughty conqueror in his pontifical habit; in consequence of which Alexander greatly favored the Jews. (Note, Dan. 8:5—7.) It is, however, evident, that he was high priest long after the events, which are mentioned at the close of this book; for Joiada then filled that office: (13:28.) and as "Darius the Persian," (22) is supposed to mean the last king of Persia, who was subdued by Alexander, about a hundred years after the principal transactions recorded in this book; this verse, and the twenty-second, must have been added by another hand after the death of Nehemiah. (26)

V. 12—21. These verses contain a catalogue of the next race of chief priests, as descended from those who came up from Babylon with Zerubbabel. (Note, 1—6.)—The marginal references shew the variations which occur in respect of their names.

V. 22—26. It is not easy or perhaps possible, to determine, why these few names of the Levites were here inserted: but probably they were persons who greatly distinguished themselves, and were highly honored and trusted by their contemporaries. (Marg. Ref.)—Darius the Persian. (22) 'This is thought to be that Darius, whom 'Alexander conquered.' Bp. Patrick.—David the man of God. (24) 36. Notes, Deut. 33:1. 2 Chr. 8:14. 1 Tim. 6:11,12.—Ward over against ward.] Notes, 8,9. 1 Chr. 25:8.—'In their 'turns, one coming on, when another went out, 'to attend in their courses, which are called 'wards.' Bp. Patrick. (13:30. Notes, 1 Chr. 9:

the Levites [x] out of all their places, to bring them to Jerusalem, to keep the dedication [y] with gladness, both with [z] thanksgivings, and with singing, with cymbals, psalteries, and with harps.

28 And the sons of the singers gathered themselves together, both out of [a] the plain country round about Jerusalem, and from the villages of [b] Netophathi;

29 Also from [c] the house of Gilgal, and out of the fields of [d] Geba, and [e] Azmaveth: for the singers had builded them villages round about Jerusalem.

30 And the priests and the Levites [f] purified themselves, and purified the people, and the gates, and the wall.

31 Then I brought up [g] the princes of Judah upon the wall, and appointed [h] two great companies of them that gave thanks, whereof one went on the right hand upon the wall toward the [i] dung-gate;

32 And after them went Hoshaiah, and half of the princes of Judah,

33 And [k] Azariah, Ezra, and Meshullam,

34 Judah, and Benjamin, and Shemaiah, and Jeremiah,

35 And certain of the priests' sons [l] with trumpets; namely, [m] Zechariah the son of Jonathan, the son of Shemaiah, the son of Mattaniah, the son of Michaiah, the son of Zaccur, the son of Asaph;

36 And his brethren, Shemaiah, and Azarael, Milalai, Gilalai, Maai, Nethaneel, and Judah, Hanani, with the [n] musical instruments of David the man of God, and [o] Ezra the scribe before them.

37 And at [p] the fountain-gate, which was over against them, they went up by [q] the stairs of the city of David, at the going up of the wall, above the house of David, even unto the [r] water-gate eastward.

38 And [s] the other company of them that gave thanks went over against them, and I after them, and the half of the people upon the wall, from beyond [t] the tower of the furnaces, even unto [u] the broad wall:

39 And from above [x] the gate of Ephraim, and above [y] the old gate, and above [z] the fish-gate, and [a] the tower of Hananeel, and the tower of Meah, even unto [b] the sheep-gate: and they stood still in [c] the prison-gate.

40 So stood [d] the two companies of them that gave thanks in the house of God, and I, and the half of the rulers with me:

41 And the priests; Eliakim, Maaseiah, Miniamin, Michaiah, Elioenai, Zechariah, and Hananiah, [e] with trumpets;

42 And Maaseiah, and Shemaiah, and Eleazar, and Uzzi, and Jehohanan, and Malchijah, and Elam, and Ezer. And the singers * sang loud with Jezrahiah their [f] overseer.

43 Also that day they [g] offered great sacrifices, and rejoiced; for [h] God had made them rejoice with great joy: [i] the wives also and the children rejoiced; so that [k] the joy of Jerusalem was heard even afar off.

V. 27, 28. Jerusalem was the holy city, and the wall was built under the immediate superintendence and blessing of JEHOVAH: it was therefore proper that it should be dedicated to that God who was there worshipped, by solemn praises, thanksgivings, prayers, and sacrifices; and thus committed to his gracious protection. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Deut. 20:5—9. Ezra 6:13—18. Dan. 9:24—27.)

V. 29. Builded, &c.] The singers had builded villages for their residence about Jerusalem; that they might be near at hand, when wanted; and attend more conveniently and regularly at the temple.

V. 30. When the priests and Levites had prepared themselves by the appointed purifications, they proceeded to purify the people, the gates, and the wall; probably by sprinkling the water of purification, with suitable prayers and supplications. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Lev. 16:15, 16. P. O. 1—19. Notes, Num. 19:)

V. 31—43. The princes and priests were divided into two companies on the wall, Ezra going before the one, and Nehemiah after the other. (36,38.) Thus they marched in a row opposite ways, in the circuit of the wall, the priests sounding the sacred trumpets, the Levites playing upon instruments and singing the praises of God, and the people accompanying them on each side, part of them on the wall, and part, it may be supposed, by the side of it. (Marg. Ref.) When they met on the opposite side of the city, they marched in a body to the temple, and offered sacrifices and thank-offerings, with rejoicings

45 And both [o] the singers and the porters kept the ward of their God, and [p] the ward of the purification, according to the commandment of David, and of Solomon his son.

CHAP. XIII.

On reading the law, Israel separates from the mixed multitude, 1—3. Eliashib having, during Nehemiah's absence, prepared a chamber at the temple for Tobiah, Nehemiah on his return, being grieved and indignant, causes the chambers to be cleansed, 4—9. He reforms abuses concerning tithes and offerings, 10—14. He prevents the profanation of the sabbath, 15—22. He opposes those who had married strange wives, and drives away the grandson of Eliashib, 23—28. His other services and prayers, 29—31.

ON that day *they read in the book of Moses in the †audience of the people; and therein was found written, that [a] the Ammonite and the [b] Moabite should not come into the congregation of God for ever; for God, by enabling them to rebuild and fortify the city, had made them to rejoice with great joy: so that the praises and acclamations of so large a multitude were heard at a great distance. (Notes, Ezra 3:12,13. Jer. 31:10—14. Matt. 21:8—11.)—Zechariah, (35) being descended from Asaph, of the line of Gershom, was no priest; and the word "namely" is improperly added. (Marg. Ref. m.)—Man of God. (36) Note, 22—26, v. 24.

2 Because they met not the children of Israel with bread and with water, but [c] hired Balaam against them, that he should curse them: howbeit [d] our God turned the curse into a blessing.

V. 44—47. The attendance, and behavior, of the priests and Levites, on this solemn occasion, seem to have greatly rejoiced the pious Jews. 'They were so glad to see such a great concourse 'of them (27, &c.) and that they performed their 'duty upon this occasion to the general satisfac-'tion of all that were present; that their hearts 'were enlarged in love to them.' Bp. Patrick. They were therefore zealous to provide for them, that their incomes might be properly paid, and regularly and impartially distributed by persons appointed for that purpose. Thus matters were settled, as they had been in the days of David and Solomon. (Marg. Ref.) Similar regulations had been made in the days of Zerubbabel; but they were completed, and put upon a durable footing, in the time of Nehemiah. (Notes, 13:5—14. 2 Chr. 31:5—19. Mal. 3:7—12.)—The tithes were paid to the Levites, as sanctified to their use; and the tithe of them was, by the Levites, sanctified to the use of the priests. (Notes, 10:35—39. Num. 18:25—32.)—'The porters "kept the ward of purification;" '(45) that is, duly observed the orders about 'purification, in not suffering any unclean person 'or unclean thing to come into the house of God.' Bp. Patrick.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord raises up a succession of worshippers from age to age, who honor him by their "sacrifices of praise and thanksgiving;" (Note, Heb. 13:15,16.) and who derive instruction and encouragement from the examples and actions of those, who have long before entered into their rest.—The believer should undertake nothing, which he cannot, and does not, dedicate to God, by seeking his direction and assistance in it and his blessing upon it; by designing his glory, and by giving praise for success in all things: and whatever he possesses he should commit to the Lord's keeping and disposal, and use it according to his will. (Note, Ps. 30: title. P. O. Note, Col. 3:16,17, v. 17.)—But all that we sinners do must be purified by the blood of sprinkling, and by the grace of the Holy Spirit, or it cannot be acceptable unto God: and the whole church of God, which is "the lot of his inheritance," and the object of his choice and delight, being descended from fallen Adam, must be thus purified and rendered holy unto the Lord.—Those who would be instrumental in the conversion of sinners, and the sanctification of believers, must begin with themselves: and when we "acknowledge God in all our ways," he will so prosper and comfort us, as often to cause us to rejoice with great joy.—If our families be trained up to join in the solemn worship of God, and in attendance on his word, we may hope that they will share our joys and privileges; and the prosperity of the church gladdens the hearts of all true believers: and in all cases, where the ministers of religion generally come forward in support of pious and benevolent measures, with zeal and alacrity, to the satisfaction of all concerned; they take the most effectual method, not only of doing much good, but of securing the liberal and cheerful payment or contribution for the supply of themselves and families. When their affections are thus lively, they will be disposed to love and rejoice in those ministers, who are instrumental to their comfort; and to care for their suitable provision. They ought, however, to attend to their several duties and not to be anxious about their interests; and then God will stir up the hearts of the people, to supply them in a comfortable and creditable manner. This they may receive with songs of praise and thanksgiving, and need not fear sanctifying a portion even of their portion, to the more immediate service of God and the support of his cause.

3 Now it came to pass, [e] when they had heard the law, [f] that they separated from Israel all [g] the mixed multitude.

4 And before this, [h] Eliashib the priest, * having the oversight of the chamber of the house of our God, was [i] allied unto Tobiah;

6 But [l] in all this time was not I at Jerusalem: for in [m] the two and thirtieth year of Artaxerxes king of Babylon, came I unto the king, and ‡ after certain days § obtained I leave of the king.

7 And I came to Jerusalem, and [n] understood of the evil that Eliashib did for Tobiah, [o] in preparing him a chamber in the courts of the house of God.

8 And [p] it grieved me sore: therefore [q] I cast forth all the household stuff of Tobiah out of the chamber.

9 Then I commanded, and [r] they cleansed the chambers: and thither brought I again the vessels of the house of God, with the meat-offering and the frankincense.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1—3. Some expositors think, that the events recorded in these verses, took place several years after those related in the former chapter, and that, during a great part of the time, Nehemiah had been absent at the Persian court. But the introductory language seems rather to imply, that they occurred immediately: though the words "on that day" may be understood with some latitude, and may mean, about that time. Indeed, it can hardly be supposed, that when the gross abuses stated in the sequel of the chapter prevailed, the public reading of the law at the temple was regularly kept up, and the people zealous to reduce it to practice. It is therefore more probable, that, before Nehemiah left Jerusalem, or when he was first gone, the law was publicly read and expounded to the congregation. (Notes, 8:1—8,13—18. 9:3,4.) At that time, the passage here referred to, coming in course, excited peculiar attention; and the people of their own accord, without compulsion, but with the concurrence of the magistrates, resolved to separate from the intimate society of the mixed multitude, especially of Ammonites and Moabites, according to the meaning of the law. (Marg. Ref. a, b.—Notes, Deut. 23:3—6.) Whether intermarriages with any of those nations, even when fully proselyted, or with their descendants, was, or was not, intended in the law, many instances would doubtless occur, in which a separation would be required; for probably few, in comparison of those with whom alliances had been formed, were fully proselyted.—It is supposed, that from the days of Ezra and Nehemiah, synagogues were built in every part of the land, where God was publicly worshipped, and his word read, expounded, or preached; which produced very salutary effects. (Notes, 2 Kings 4:23. 2 Chr. 17:7—9.) A copy of the scriptures then extant, was placed in every synagogue; and the whole was divided into portions or lessons, for the several days when they were accustomed to assemble for that purpose; and probably the same became the general usage in the court of the temple. (Luke 4:16—22. Acts 13:13—15. 15:21.)

V. 4. Eliashib had before this formed an alliance with Tobiah the Ammonite, but perhaps secretly to escape censure. (Notes, 2:9,10,19,20. 4:6:17—19.) It does not appear, that the high priest was, or that his sons were, married to any of Tobiah's family: but he was confederated with him, and related to those who were; and his authority over the temple and all its buildings, enabled him to commit that scandalous profanation, which is next related.—The word rendered "chamber," seems to mean the out-buildings of the temple in general.

V. 5, 6. Nehemiah was first commissioned by Artaxerxes in the twentieth year of his reign; and this journey to court took place in his thirty-second year; so that twelve years had elapsed, concerning which we have little account: and the following events occurred after the end of those years.—When Nehemiah was gone from Jerusalem, Eliashib seems to have invited Tobiah thither: and though all Moabites and Ammonites had been publicly excluded from the congregation, according to the law of God; yet the high priest admitted this unproselyted Ammonite, who was as bitter an enemy to Israel as Balak or Balaam had been, even into the chambers of the temple; casting out thence the consecrated oblations to make room for him; (2 Chr. 31:11—13, v. 12. Notes, 10:35—39. 12:44—47. 1 Kings 6:5,6. 1 Chr. 28:11—13.) and probably forming him a sumptuous apartment, by throwing many of them into one!—This was as great contempt of the divine law, profanation of the temple, and disgrace of the priesthood, as could well be imagined.

King of Babylon. (6) The kings of Persia reigned over Babylon, and all the regions, which had been before subject to the kings of Babylon: but their general residence was at Shushan, or Susa. (1:1.) This was much more distant from Jerusalem than Babylon: but Nehemiah, most probably, journeyed thither on this occasion.

V. 7—9. Nehemiah is generally supposed to have been absent from Jerusalem only one year: but the great abuses, which prevailed at his return, favor the opinion of those who think that about five years intervened; and there is nothing in the text that militates against it: for the words rendered "after certain days," or, at the end of days, (6. marg.) do not necessarily signify after one year, but may denote a longer time. (Dan. 12:13. Heb.) At his return, however, he was greatly afflicted and displeased at what had taken place, and he soon exercised his authority, in the most decided manner, to clear the temple from such a profanation, and to purify the chambers, in the appointed and accustomed manner, that they might be restored to their proper use. (Notes, 5:6,7. Ezra 9:3—15. 10:2.)—It is probable, that Eliashib was dead before Nehemiah returned; and that Tobiah did not choose to appear at Jerusalem to see after his furniture.

V. 10—13. As the high priest had ventured profanely to appropriate the chambers of the temple, for the entertainment of an Ammonite; perhaps he had also sacrilegiously intercepted the revenues of the Levites for similar purposes: or the people were reluctant to pay their tithes, when so bad a use was made of them, or so little care was taken of them. (Note, 12:44—47.) Thus the Levites were driven from their office, to get their living by cultivating the land, or by other secular employments; and the temple-service, especially the psalmody, was interrupted.—The rulers, who had been left in trust, ought to have exerted their authority to prevent such mismanagement; but probably they had concurred in it, out of regard to their secular interests; and therefore Nehemiah called them to account for this misconduct. Malachi is supposed to have prophesied about this time, and he seems repeatedly to refer to these abuses. (Notes, Mal. 1:9—14. 3:7—12.) 'It is a 'great artifice of the devil, by his instruments, to 'defraud the ministers of religion of their neces-'sary maintenance, that he may thereby abolish 'religion itself.' Wolphius, in Bp. Patrick. (Notes, 1 Cor. 9:7—18.) Nehemiah, however, not only recalled the Levites, but having, it seems, without difficulty, induced the people to bring their tithes, he placed the distribution of them in the hands of faithful men, in whom all parties reposed confidence. (Notes, 2 Chr. 31:15—19. Acts 6:1—6.)

V. 14. (Marg. and Marg. Ref.) It is evident Nehemiah expected that the Lord would remember his good deeds, and vouchsafe them a gracious recompense, notwithstanding defects in them, and sin in him; after the same manner, as even the apostle Paul assures the Hebrews, that the Lord would "not forget their work and labor of love;" not as claiming "a reward of debt." (Notes, 20—22, v. 22. Rom. 4:4,5. Heb. 6:9,10.) But it is also worthy of notice, that these "good deeds," or kindnesses, "which he had done for the house of God," consisted in using his authority to protect the ministers of religion, from those who defrauded them of their maintenance. There have been times, when enriching the clergy beyond all bounds, and without requiring them to attend on their ministry, was thought the height of piety: but it may be questioned whether rulers may not at present, as well as for some past ages, have run into the contrary extreme; and Nehemiah's firm and prudent conduct in this respect, might be imitated with good effect by Christian princes and rulers. (Note, 2 Chr. 31:5—7. P. O. 1—10.)

V. 15—18. It can hardly be supposed, that in the course of one year of Nehemiah's absence, such gross and open profanation of the sabbath should have been introduced and become general. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 10:30,31. Num. 15:30—36. Jer. 17:19—27. John 5:10—16.)—The Tyrians, as heathens, not regarding the sabbath, tempted the Jews to break it by trading with them. The magistrates must have been shamefully negligent, in conniving at these abuses, till they were become so notorious: and, the nation seemed to be proceeding, in many respects, as their fathers had done, in provoking the wrath of God against them.—Fish. (16) How far the concessions made by our laws, in respect of the selling some fish on the Lord's day, agree with this, or consist with at the gates, that there should no burden be brought in on the sabbath-day.

20 So the merchants, and sellers of all kind of ware, lodged without Jerusalem once or twice.

21 Then [s] I testified against them, and said unto them, Why lodge ye [*] about the wall? if ye do so again, [t] I will lay hands on you. From that time forth came they no more on the sabbath.

22 And [u] I commanded the Levites, that they should [x] cleanse themselves, and that they should come and keep the gates, to [y] sanctify the sabbath-day. [z] Remember me, O my God, concerning this also, and [a] spare me according to the [†] greatness of thy mercy.

23 ¶ In those days also saw I Jews [b] that had [‡] married wives of [c] Ashdod, of [d] Ammon, and of Moab:

24 And their children spake half in the speech of Ashdod, and [§] could not speak in the Jews' language, but according to the language of [‖] each people.

25 And [e] I contended with them, [f] and [¶] cursed them, and [g] smote certain of them, and [h] plucked off their hair, and [i] made them swear by God, saying, [k] Ye shall not give your daughters unto their sons, nor take their daughters unto your sons, or for yourselves.

26 [l] Did not Solomon king of Israel sin by these things? [m] yet among many nations was there no king like him, who was beloved of his God, and God made him king over all Israel: nevertheless even him did outlandish women cause to sin.

27 [n] Shall we then hearken unto you to do all this great evil, to transgress against our God, in marrying strange wives?

28 And one of the sons of [o] Joiada, the son of [p] Eliashib, the high priest, was [q] son-in-law to [r] Sanballat the Horonite: therefore [s] I chased him from me.

29 [t] Remember them, O my God, [] because they have defiled the priesthood, and [u] the covenant of the priesthood, and of the Levites.

30 Thus [x] cleansed I them from all strangers, and [y] appointed the wards of the priests and the Levites, every one in his business;

hallowing the sabbath, may fairly be questioned.

V. 19. Some of my servants, &c.] (Notes, 4: 16,18—23. 5:14—18.) Nehemiah could place more dependence in this case on his own attendants, than on the porters appointed by the nobles and rulers of Judah; who probably countenanced this profanation, in order to indulge their luxury or avarice.

V. 20—22. The merchants and dealers, from Tyre and other places, still hoped to find some opportunity of trading on the sabbath, either with the citizens or countrymen; but, as they were endeavoring to induce the Jews to break the law of God, and also that of the rulers of Judah; Nehemiah solemnly assured them, that if they did not desist, he would proceed to inflict punishment on them.—He also appointed the Levites to watch the gates, perhaps supposing they would be more regarded than his servants; and also, because he would have the watch continued, even if he should leave Jerusalem.—This reformation seems to have produced very durable effects; for in the after ages of the Jewish church, they became exact even to superstition in observing the sabbath. Probably, his other regulations were at last equally effectual; but we have no more canonical history concerning them.

Remember, &c. (22) 'Nehemiah had besought 'God to "remember his good deeds;" (14) but to 'shew that he did not think there was any proper 'merit or worthiness in them, which required a 'reward as a debt, in justice due to them, he here explains himself; and desires to be rewarded, or 'rather pardoned, out of God's free goodness, ac- 'cording to the greatness, or the multitude, of his 'mercies.' Bp. Patrick. (Notes, 31. Ps. 106:4, 5. 119:132. Luke 23:39—43.)

V. 23—30. Some time must have elapsed after Nehemiah's departure from Jerusalem, before the children of these marriages could betray their origin by their speech: for though the Ashdodites lived near the Jews, their language was, it seems, materially different from theirs: yet probably they were not contracted before that event, and the reform seems to have been made very soon after his return. This separation also evidently was diverse from that recorded before: (Note, 1—3.) for that was the effect of reading the law, and by voluntary consent; this by more vehement and coercive measures.—When this zealous reformer found these undeniable proofs of the people's guilt, he began without delay to put a stop to the evil. He contended, or vehemently argued, the matter, with those who were concerned; proving the criminality and the fatal effects of such marriages from the scriptures, in an unanswerable manner. (Notes, 1 Kings 11: 1—13.) He then denounced the awful curse of God upon such as persisted in disobedience, and perhaps excluded them from the congregation: he punished such as were refractory, with immediate scourging; and put others of them under a disgraceful stigma, by plucking off their hair; (Note, Is. 50:5,6.) and made them all solemnly swear to separate from their heathen wives. (Notes, 5:10—13. 10:29—31. Ezra 9: 10 Mal

2:1—16.)—Among the other examples of his impartial severity, he banished the grandson of Eliashib, who had married the daughter of Sanballat. (Notes, Lev. 21:7—15.) Josephus relates that this young man was named Manasseh, and that at his instance Sanballat and the Samaritans built their temple upon mount Gerizim, in opposition to that at Jerusalem; at which he officiated, in some measure, according to the ritual appointments of Moses. Hence schism, emulation, and rancorous enmity between the two nations, were perpetuated to future ages. The authority, which Nehemiah exercised over the priests, even the chief of them, and in requiring the ministers of religion to attend to their several duties; as well as over the people, requiring them to render the priests and Levites their dues; is no where expressly enjoined on governors, or kings, in the Mosaic law: yet as this exercise of authority was entirely limited to the things which God had commanded; he performed a good and acceptable service, and properly improved his talents. (Notes, 2 Chr. 29:3—5. 30:12.)

Remember them, &c. (29) By visiting with some evident token of his holy indignation, the principal offenders in these things, the Lord would both display his own glory, and give a salutary warning to others, tending to repress such gross violations of his law; and even to bring the offenders to repentance. (Notes, Lev. 10:1—3. 21:7—15. Num. 25:11—13. 1 Cor. 5:1—5, v. 5.)

V. 31. Patrick*

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

The public reading of the whole word of God, as far as it relates to our faith and practice, is of immense advantage to true religion. Though we have heard many sermons, and have the Bible in our hands, few of us are acquainted with every part of it; and many live in violation of its injunctions, through ignorance or inattention. But when those who are well disposed hear the word of God condemn any part of their conduct, they are reminded to repent and seek forgiveness, and to break off the sin, and attend to the neglected duty.—They who are unkind to the people of God, who attempt to afflict them, or who wish them evil, will be punished as his enemies; and he will turn their curses and malicious deeds into blessings to those who trust and obey him.—Alas, how prone is human nature to evil! When the restraints of influence or authority are withdrawn, men break out into those excesses of which they seemed incapable; whilst the eye and authority of God are treated with almost atheistical disregard. —They who have enjoyed the highest dignities in the visible church, by divine right, have sometimes been equally distinguished by sacrilegious impiety; and have openly committed those crimes, which the most profane of the laity would not have ventured on without hesitation and dismay! But if sacredness of character will not restrain men from setting a pernicious example, it should not shelter them from censure, or condign punishment by the magistrate. (Note, 1 Kings 2:26, 27.)—As nobles have too generally, in every age and country, deemed themselves privileged to disregard the divine law, and many human institutions obligatory on others; magistrates and reformers need courage and resolution, as well as impartiality and integrity.—Our grief, for the sins which we witness, should stimulate us to oppose them strenuously, according to the duty of our station, and not induce us to yield to unmanly despondency.—It is not expedient, that magistrates or ministers should be long absent from their respective charges: for "one sinner" will often take advantage of their absence, to "destroy much good;" and by example, insinuation, and influence, to subvert their most useful regulations, and to render their designs abortive.—Few ministers are willing, during any length of time, to labor in their ministry, under the pressure or the prospect of indigence; but most of them will turn to more profitable occupations: so that depriving the clergy of a suitable maintenance forms one of Satan's projects, for causing the house and ordinances of God to be forsaken. Pious magistrates should peculiarly attend to this: they should take care that the ministers of the gospel be encouraged to labor in their proper places, and that a competent provision be made for them: nor are any, except men of approved fidelity, to be trusted in such concerns.

V. 15—31.

The due observance of the Lord's day forms an important object for the attention of those, who would promote true godliness: and the Christian magistrate ought to take proper measures, to prevent that sacred season from being profaned by labor, merchandise, or those occupations which subserve the luxury and pride of life. As nobles too commonly set the example both of breaking God's commandments, and of disregarding royal edicts, in this particular; they must first be contended with, and vigorously urged to do their duty. Persons in the higher orders of society, in general, little consider the extensive effects of their misconduct: if they violate the holy day of God, others will assuredly imitate their impiety; and thus the flood-gates of ungodliness and wickedness will be thrown open, which must bring the wrath of God on guilty nations. Indeed the present state of unprincipled profligacy in these kingdoms, may be shewn in great measure to originate from the relaxed sentiments, which some time after the reformation began to prevail concerning the spending of the sabbath. And as these have gained ground, that holy day has gradually become more and more the time, when the lower orders are let loose to corrupt one another.—It is also necessary to repeat the observation, that improper marriages have ensnared the wisest men, have always led to apostacies, and tended to the ruin of succeeding generations. The children readily imbibe the principles of the infidel or ungodly parent, and soon forget the very language and appearance of piety; or substitute a corrupt religion, in the stead of that which comes from God, and leads to him.—Mothers likewise have a very important part allotted them in forming the manners of mankind; as the care of children in their tender years is almost wholly committed to them. It is therefore of great consequence to society, that females should be educated with a view to this most momentous employment, and qualified for the discharge of their duty in it. Every wise man, in contracting marriage, should consider whether the object of his choice would be a proper person to intrust with his children's tuition: and every mother should consider, that this is the most important part of her charge, and most of all calls for assiduity, prudence, and circumspection. (Note, 2 Tim. 1:3—5. P. O. 3:10—17.)—In opposing fashionable and reputable vices; conclusive arguments, vehement expostulations, apposite examples, awful declarations of the wrath of God, and solemn engagements, may have the proper effect upon some: but the magistrate must often use more vigorous measures. He must disgrace, punish, and chase away the ringleaders in iniquity, without respect of persons or families: and severity to a few will prove mercy to many. But in every thing the word of God must be our rule; the love and fear of God, our principle; and his glory, in the prosperity of his cause and the welfare of his people, our great object. Whilst we labor in this manner, we must expect the enmity and opposition of a wicked world: but we may go on with confidence in the spirit of faith and prayer. We may humbly hope, that the Lord will "remember us," and "not wipe out our services;" that he will "spare us according to the greatness of his mercy," accept both our persons and our defective endeavors to glorify him: and if he "remember us for good," that will be a sufficient recompense and happiness for ever: while those who impenitently sin against him, and especially such as disgrace a sacred character and office, will be remembered for evil, to their everlasting shame, confusion, and destruction, except timely and deep repentance intervene.

BOOK OF ESTHER.

This book, which takes its name from the principal character introduced in it, was most probably written by Mordecai, and inserted in the canon of Scripture by Ezra and his assistants, or by their successors: but there are various opinions among learned men on this subject. The Jews have always held the book of Esther in great veneration; and as the feast of Purim (9:26—32.) is observed by them to this day, no reasonable doubt can be entertained concerning the authenticity of the narrative. It contains no prophecies, and it is not referred to in the New Testament.—It is also very remarkable, that there is no clear mention in it of any of the names, by which the God of Israel is distinguished in the sacred oracles: yet it is most evidently intended, as well as admirably calculated, to illustrate the doctrine of Providence; and the methods and instruments by which the great Ruler of the world accomplishes his purposes, both of mercy and of judgment. Perhaps this omission of the names of God was designed. Facts, well known, concerning the worshippers of JEHOVAH, the plot formed for their extirpation, and the wonderful deliverance vouchsafed them, were thus simply stated; in order that every reader might judge for himself, whether these facts did not demonstrate, that the God of the Jews was the great Ruler of the universe. Had this conclusion been urged on the Gentiles by a despised Jew, their prejudices might have been excited: let the simple narrative then speak for itself.—Several additional chapters are found in the Apocrypha; but they never were in the Hebrew text, and the Jews never received them: they principally contain repetitions, or additions, intended to decorate the history; but which in fact destroy its simple unity and beauty: and some things in them cannot be reconciled with the times to which the history must relate.—The preceding books form a specimen of the Lord's care of his church in Judea; this shews his favor to the nation in general. A large proportion of those, who continued in remote countries, were very blameable in so doing: yet he would not leave the nation in the hand of their enemies, or deprive them of his mercy and grace on that account.

CHAP. I.

Ahasuerus, king of Persia, makes a royal feast, 1—9. He sends for Vashti his queen, who refuses to come, 10—12. By the advice of his counsellors, he divorces her, and asserts, by a public decree, the authority of men over their wives, 13—22.

NOW it came to pass in the days of [a] Ahasuerus, (this is Ahasuerus which reigned [b] from India even unto Ethiopia, over [c] an hundred and seven and twenty provinces;)

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1, 2. It is evident, that the events recorded in this book, took place, after the complete establishment of the Persian empire; for Shushan was the royal city of Persia. (Note, Neh. 1:1. Dan. 8:2.) But various have been the opinions of learned men, concerning the Persian king, who is here called Ahasuerus. I am, however, fully satisfied with the arguments of Dean Prideaux: and consequently suppose Ahasuerus to have been Artaxerxes Longimanus, who commissioned both Ezra and Nehemiah. The extent of his dominions, his liberality, and his kindness to the Jews, favor the supposition. (Notes, Ezra 7:1—5,11—26. Neh. 1:1. 2:5,6. v. 6.) The Septuagint translation calls him Artaxerxes, and Josephus calls him Artaxerxes Longimanus. See Prideaux's Connection, printed 1749, v. i. p. 361—364.

3 In the third year of his reign, [f] he made a feast unto all his princes, and his servants; the power [g] of Persia and Media, [h] the nobles and princes of the provinces, being before him:

4 When [i] he shewed [j] the riches of his glorious kingdom, and the honor of his [k] excellent majesty, many days, even an hundred and fourscore days.

5 And when these days were expired, the king made a feast unto all the people that were * present in Shushan the palace, both unto great and small, [l] seven days, in the court of the garden of the king's palace;

6 Where were [m] white, green, and † blue hangings, fastened with cords of fine linen and purple to silver rings, and pillars of marble: [n] the beds were of gold and silver, upon a pavement of ‡ red, and blue, and white, and black marble.

7 And they gave them drink in [o] vessels of gold, (the vessels being diverse one from another,) and § royal wine in abundance, according to the ‖ state of the king:

8 And the drinking was according to the law; [p] none did compel: for so the king had appointed to all [q] the officers of his house, that they should do according to every man's pleasure.

V. 3—5. It is probable that the princes and nobles from the several parts of Ahasuerus's immense dominions, were entertained in rotation, during six months, with the most studied and ostentatious display of magnificence, of wealth, and liberality which could be conceived: and that afterwards all the citizens of Shushan, without distinction, were feasted for seven days in like manner. (Marg. Ref.—Note, Matt. 14:15—21.)

V. 6. Marg. and Marg. Ref.—The beds.] On these the guests sat, or reclined, at table. (Note, Am. 6:3—8.)

V. 7, 8. (Marg. Ref. o.) The absurd practice of urging people to drink more strong liquor, than they are of themselves inclined to, has prevailed in all ages; though it is a most gross violation of common sense, freedom, and civility, as well as of morality and religion. It seems to have been devised and supported by drunkards, that the more sober part of mankind might be drawn in to keep them in countenance, by a reluctant intoxication.—The regulation enjoined by the king was very necessary in the midst of so many incentives to intemperance; and his mind, being thus made known, doubtless prevented many disorders which otherwise would have been committed.

V. 9. It seems, that the women were feasted by the queen in a more retired situation than the nobles and people, and were kept separate from the men by express appointment; which made the subsequent order of the king appear the more unreasonable. (Note, 10—12.)

V. 10—12. When the customs of the Persians relative to their women, especially the wives of their kings, are considered, this injunction of Ahasuerus must appear highly improper and inconsistent. He sent seven of his chamberlains, (which so far was honorable to his queen;) commanding her to appear in her royal attire, in order that a number of princes and nobles, who were heated with wine, might be gratified by a sight of her singular beauty! A reluctance therefore to an exhibition, so contrary to the decorum observed by her sex, became her rank and modesty: but as the king was peremptory, and every one must have known that she came at his command; it was highly imprudent in her, to persist in a refusal, which could terminate only in an open contest and the most fatal effects. His anger 'was the more immoderate, because his blood was 'heated with wine, which made his passion too 'strong for his reason.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 13, 14. These wise men, being acquainted with the records of the kingdom, might be able to bring precedents, how former kings had acted hath not performed the commandment of the king Ahasuerus, by the chamberlains?

16 And Memucan answered before the king and the princes, Vashti the queen hath not [e] done wrong to the king only, but also to all the princes, and to all the people, that are in all the provinces of the king Ahasuerus.

17 For this deed of the queen shall come abroad unto all women, so that they shall [f] despise their husbands in their eyes, when it shall be reported, The king Ahasuerus commanded Vashti the queen to be brought in before him, but she came not.

18 Likewise shall the ladies of Persia and Media say this day unto all the king's princes, which have heard of the deed of the queen. Thus shall there arise too much contempt and wrath.

19 If [*] it please the king, let there go a royal commandment [†] from him, and let it be written among the laws of the Persians and the Medes, that [‡] it be not altered, that Vashti come no more before king Ahasuerus; and let the king give her royal estate unto [§] another [g] that is better than she.

20 And when the king's decree which he shall make shall be published [h] throughout all his empire, (for it is great,) [i] all the wives shall give to their husbands honor, both to great and small.

21 And the saying [‖] pleased the king and the princes; and the king did according to the word of Memucan:

22 For he sent letters into all the king's provinces, [j] into every province according to the writing thereof, and to every people after their language, [k] that every man should bear rule in his own house, and that [¶] it should be published [l] according to the language of every people.

under circumstances in any respect similar, according to the laws and customs of the kingdom; as well as to understand in general what was proper to be done in the present emergency. (1 Chr. 12:32.) And it was the king's manner, in all such matters, to confer with those who knew law and judgment.—The seven counsellors here mentioned had free access to the king, and were the first subjects in the kingdom. (Note, Ezra 7:14.)

V. 15. Some suppose, that Ahasuerus was inclined to forgive Vashti, if it might stand with the honor of his government, and the laws of the realm. But others think, that he was disposed to divorce her, or otherwise punish her; but wished to proceed against her under color of law and justice.

V. 16—18. Memucan is mentioned last of the seven counsellors: and it is supposed he was the youngest, or last in order on some account; and that he was required to give his opinion first, that he might not previously be biassed by the sentiments of his seniors or superiors.—It is uncertain, whether Memucan really deemed the queen's disobedience a dangerous precedent, while it remained unpunished; or whether he paid court to the king, by counselling him to follow his own humor, and by suggesting a plausible reason for so doing. (Notes, 2 Sam. 14:6—22. P. O. 1—20.) He, however, argued that the queen's rank, and the notoriety and pertinacity of her disobedience, would encourage other women to despise the persons and authority of their husbands; which contempt in the women would excite the wrath of the men, and thus destroy domestic subordination and peace.—Yet if husbands had been careful not to act contemptibly, or to give foolish and improper commands, they might have ruled by reason and affection, without either such fatal consequences, or violent measures. But despotism in civil government leads to despotism in domestic life: men imagine, that there is no way to rule, but by force and terror; and thus the superior relations become tyrants, and the inferior, slaves, submitting by constraint, without either conviction or affection.

V. 19—22. By this irrevocable edict, which was published in the various languages, spoken through the immense empire of the Persians, that all might understand it, Ahasuerus's example was virtually proposed for general imitation: so that every husband was allowed to divorce his wife, if she disobeyed his command, even when evidently foolish and unreasonable! But whether pride, resentment, policy, or lust, predominated in the councils of Ahasuerus, may remain uncertain: but the Lord was thus making preparation for defeating Haman's diabolical project, long before it ever entered into his heart, and before he arrived at the height of his power and prosperity. (Notes, 3: 6—15. 8:8. Ps. 75:10. Ez. 38:10.)

It should be published, &c. (22) Marg.—'The 'decree runs in the Hebrew, "That every man 'should bear rule in his own house, and speak in 'the language of his people:" ... that is, he should 'give his commands in his own language, which 'every one was bound to learn.' Bp. Patrick. It is, however, evident, that great care was taken in all these decrees, that they should be circulated in each province in the language of that province, that all might understand them. (3:17. 8:9.) How important then is it, that the word of God should be translated into every language, and circulated in that language which is best understood in every land! and that all, without exception, should be offered them in the vulgar tongue, in every country.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—12.

No extent of possessions or dominion can satisfy the human heart, and give contentment or felicity even in this present life. Cares, fears, and temptations are augmented by every accession; the power of doing good or harm is enlarged, and alas! the latter is generally chosen. But "to whom much is given, of him will much be required" by the great Proprietor, who is continually saying to monarchs, as well as to subjects, "Give an account of thy stewardship; for thou mayest be no longer steward."—Ostentatious generosity and magnificence, for a man's own honor and glory, that his wealth, bounty, and taste may be admir

CHAP. II.

By advice of his servants, Ahasuerus causes fair virgins to be sought out in every province of his kingdom, that he may choose a queen, 1—4. Esther had been brought up by Mordecai, 5—7. She obtains favor with the keeper of the women; pleases the king; and is made queen, having observed Mordecai's directions, 8—20. Mordecai discovers a plot against the king; the criminals are punished; and his service is registered in the chronicles of the kingdom, 21—23.

AFTER these things, when the wrath of king Ahasuerus was appeased, [a] he remembered Vashti, and [b] what she had done, and what was decreed against her.

ed and applauded, is a common idolatry of the great and noble: and, except grace prevail in the heart, self-exaltation and self-indulgence, in some form or other, will be the ruling principles. But indeed the honor of every endowment, possession, or achievement, of created beings, belongs solely to the underived, unchangeable Creator: his glory, in our own true felicity and that of our fellow-creatures, should be our great end in every action; and all other considerations ought to be subordinated to it, and regulated by it.—But if the feast of an earthly monarch, when he would "shew the riches of his glorious kingdom and the honor of his excellent majesty," was so magnificent; what will be that feast, which the King of kings has prepared, to "shew the riches of his glorious kingdom, and the honor of his excellent majesty," "to the praise of the glory of his grace," in heaven, for ever and ever! There will be unfading splendor, inexhaustible abundance, and unalloyed pleasures, without interruption or satiety; and without danger or fear of excess: nor will there arise the least discord to mar enjoyment, through all the ages of eternity. "All things are ready" for this feast; sinners without exception are invited: may we accept the gracious invitation; seek and find the wedding-garment; and sit down at the marriage-supper of the Lamb!—But in all other feasts, the pleasure is greatly alloyed, and soon palls; and too generally they prove unfavorable, not only to wisdom and piety, but even to present comfort and advantage. Seldom do any frequent them, without being led into some degree of excess, injurious to their strength of body and vigor of mind. They are scenes of temptation, suited to excite man's various evil propensities. The enemy of souls will be sure to avail himself of the unguarded moments, especially of such as are in reputation for wisdom and piety; and he has artfully prevailed to render it creditable, for men to become tempters of each other to intemperance: so that few public entertainments, even among professed Christians, are conducted by such good rules as this heathen feast. But real Christians must not only shun such scenes, and separate from those who frequent them; but likewise, by warnings and exhortations, endeavor to preserve their brethren from sin: and if, by this conduct at their own tables, they incur the censure of being penurious; "the poor, whom they always have with them," afford them a fair occasion of refuting the slander. Indeed, that will go very far in hospitality to the indigent, which is quickly wasted by pampering the luxury of the affluent. (Note, Luke 14:12—14. P. O. 12—24.)—Seasons of peculiar festivity often terminate in vexation. Wine and jovial company elate the mind, add strength to the passions, and stun the voice of reason and conscience. On such occasions caprice generally dictates the conduct; unreasonable claims are started, or projects formed; and the eagerness of men's spirits ill brooks contradiction or affront, while it disposes to give them. Thus anger is excited and exasperated; and discords, revenge, duels, and murders, are the frequent consequences of pleasurable meetings! Propriety and decorum are also often disregarded; the respect and attention due to relatives are forgotten; improper requisitions are made, by which contempt and imprudent opposition are excited; affection is suspended, during the reign of haughty resentment; and all parties forget their reciprocal interests and duties, till their reputation and peace receive such wounds, as can seldom admit of a complete cure.—Let it also be specially noted, that superiors, in all cases and circumstances, should be careful not to command what may reasonably be disobeyed; for this must weaken their authority, and prove a temptation to those over whom they rule: yet inferiors ought never to persist in a refusal, except when it is really a point of conscience towards God. (Notes, Rom. 13:1—7.)

V. 13—22.

There would be safety in the multitude of counsellors, if men did but welcome plain-dealing; and if the counsellors of princes did not generally consult their inclinations, rather than their interests.—Domestic subordination doubtless ought to be preserved; and the wife ought to honor and obey her own husband: yet surely this may be effected by other means, beside severe laws, divorces, and measures more pernicious, than the evil which they are intended to remedy! Regard to mutual interest, comfort, and reputation, serves to keep the world in tolerable order: the prudence and affection of the husband will do great things, where properly exercised: the general regard, which the more decent members of the community have to the precepts and authority of God, has considerable effect: true grace radically cures that evil, from which domestic discord arises: and in deplorable cases where the peace of society is materially violated, the magistrate may properly interpose. All other evils arising from this source may better be tolerated, than to attempt a remedy, by making the men tyrants, and the women slaves: while it is evident that the former fail as much, and commonly far more, in the duty of their relation, than the latter. Nor should even the interests of kingdoms be promoted, were it possible, by evident injustice.—The example of the great has a very extensive effect, and they are the more deeply concerned, not to exhibit a pernicious pattern to their inferiors: but human policy sometimes overshoots its mark; and to prevent the effect of one injurious precedent, forms another of still more fatal tendency. Let us then keep to the rule of God's word, and it will guide the humble, obedient believer through all these labyrinths; and be "a lantern to his feet, and a light unto his paths." Let us be upon our guard against every incentive to our passions; watching and praying against wrath, pride, and self-will, as well as sensual indulgence. Let us learn to bridle our tempers; to conquer by yielding; and to "leave off contention before it be meddled with." And let us rejoice that the Lord reigns, and will over-rule all the madness and folly of mankind, for the purposes of his own glory, and the safety and felicity of his believing, obedient people.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1. When the vehemency of the king's anger subsided, his affection for Vashti revived; and probably he was sensible, that he had acted with precipitation and severity, and had done her injustice. But with all his power and authority, he could not again receive her into favor, without violating a fundamental constitution of the Persian government; which required that no edict, which the king had once established.

2 Then said the [c] king's servants, that ministered unto him, [d] Let there be fair young virgins sought for the king:

3 And let the king appoint officers [e] in all the provinces of his kingdom, that they may gather together all the fair young virgins unto Shushan the palace, to the house of the women, unto * the custody of [f] Hege the king's chamberlain, keeper of the women; and let [g] their things for purification be given them:

4 And let the maiden which pleaseth the king, be queen instead of Vashti. And [n] the thing pleased the king; and he did so.

5 ¶ Now in [i] Shushan the palace there was a [j] certain Jew, whose name was Mordecai, the son of Jair, [k] the son of Shimei, the son of Kish, a Benjamite;

6 Who had been carried away from Jerusalem, with the captivity which had been carried away with [l] Jeconiah king of Judah, whom Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon had carried away.

7 And he † brought up [n] Hadassah, that is Esther, [o] his uncle's daughter: for she had neither father nor mother, and the maid was ‡ fair and beautiful; whom Mordecai, when her father and mother were dead, [p] took for his own daughter.

8 ¶ So it came to pass, when the king's commandment and his decree was heard, and when many maidens were gathered together unto Shushan the palace, to the custody of [q] Hegai, that Esther was brought also unto the king's house, to the custody of Hegai, keeper of the women.

9 And the maiden pleased him, and [r] she obtained kindness of him; and he speedily gave her [s] her things for purification, with § such things as belonged to her, and seven maidens which were meet to be given her, out of the king's house: and he ‖ preferred her and her maids unto the best place of the house of the women.

should be reversed. The fatal effects of this absurd policy will be sufficiently illustrated, in the sequel of this narrative. Under color of ascribing infallibility to the sovereign, and thus flattering his pride; this restriction perpetually exposed him, in his unguarded hours, to be deluded into the most pernicious measures; and would not so much as allow him to remedy the injustice, or impolicy, into which he had been betrayed, when reflection and experience had made him sensible of his errors. (Notes, 8:3—13. 9:1—16. Dan. 6:12—17.) And this was the more absurd and dangerous in its nature and effects, if they may be depended on, who inform us, that the Persian monarchs, and their counsellors, commonly framed their edicts at feasts, and when they were drinking. (Note, 3:12—15.)

V. 2—4. (8—14. Note, 1 Kings 1:1—4.) It is uncertain, whether this was the project of the seven counsellors before mentioned; (Note, 1:16—18.) or of some other servants, who more immediately ministered to the king's pleasures. It seems, however, to have been devised, in order to prevent him from thinking any more of Vashti, whose restoration to favor must be guarded against, for the safety of those who had counselled the king to exercise so great severity against her: for, if he had been greatly desirous of Vashti's company, the law of the Medes and Persians would scarcely have prevented him from recalling her. This will appear by the following instance:—Cambyses, king of Persia, having conceived a violent passion for his own sister, inquired of his counsellors whether it was lawful for him to marry her? And they, dreading the effects of his resentment if they opposed his will, answered, that there was no law in Persia, by which a man was allowed to marry his sister, but that it was lawful for the king of Persia to do what he pleased.—It must also be noted, that though the king could not legally reverse the decree which he had signed and sealed; yet he might put to death the counsellors, who induced him to ratify it. (Notes, 7:7—10. 8:8. Dan. 6:24.)

V. 5—7. Mordecai, though a Benjamite, is repeatedly called the Jew: for the whole nation was now called after Judah. (Notes, Gen. 49:8—10. 2 Kings 16:6.)—Some of Mordecai's ancestors, (probably Kish,) had been carried to Babylon with Jeconiah; (Note, 2 Kings 24:8—16.) and the family afterwards settled at Shushan. But it seems that they were diminished in number, or impoverished: so that Mordecai's own cousin had been left an orphan; and he, being older than she was, had brought her up, and in all respects behaved as a father to her. Her Jewish name was Hadassah, but the Persians called her Esther.—The conjectures of several learned men concerning her, taken from rather a slight similarity of names between her and the wives of some of the Persian kings, mentioned in Pagan historians, seem entirely groundless; as the dissimilarity of character, and indeed all other circumstances, vastly preponderate against them.

V. 8—10. As Mordecai was so scrupulous in respect of Haman, (Notes, 3:2—5.) it has been wondered, how he could consent to Esther's becoming the wife, or concubine, of a heathen prince, contrary to the law of Moses. But it does not seem to have been left to the choice, either of Mordecai or of Esther. By a public edict, the most beautiful virgins were selected from all parts of Ahasuerus's dominions; and it would have been unavailing, as well as dangerous, to have opposed the persons employed in this business. 'The word we translate "was 'brought," may be rendered was taken; and that 'by force, as the word sometimes signifies; and 'as the former Targum here explains it, She was 'brought by violence.' Bp. Patrick.—If Esther before the court of the women's house, to know * how Esther did, and what should become of her.

12 ¶ Now when every maid's turn was come [y] to go in to king Ahasuerus, after that she had been twelve months, according to the manner of the women, (for so were the days of their purifications accomplished, to wit, [z] six months with oil of myrrh, and six months with sweet odors, and with other things for the purifying of the women;)

13 Then thus came every maiden unto the king; whatsoever she desired was given her, to go with her out of the house of the women, unto the king's house.

14 In the evening she went, and on the morrow she returned into the second house of the women, to the custody of Shaashgaz, the king's chamberlain, which kept the concubines: she came in unto the king no more, except the king [a] delighted in her, and that [b] she were called by name. [Practical Observations.]

15 ¶ Now when the turn of Esther, the daughter of Abihail the uncle of Mordecai, [c] who had taken her for his daughter, was come to go in unto the king, she required nothing but what Hegai the king's chamberlain, the keeper of the women, appointed. And [d] Esther obtained favor in the sight of all them that looked upon her.

16 So Esther was taken unto king Ahasuerus into his house royal in [e] the tenth month, which is the month Tebeth, in [f] the seventh year of his reign.

17 And the king loved Esther above all the women, and she obtained grace and † favor ‡ in his sight more than all the virgins; [g] so that he set the royal crown upon her head, and made her queen instead of Vashti.

18 Then the king [h] made a great feast unto all his princes and his servants, even Esther's feast; and he made a § release to the provinces, and [i] gave gifts according to the state of the king.

19 And when [k] the virgins were gathered together the second time, then Mordecai [l] sat in the king's gate.

20 Esther [m] had not yet shewed her kindred, nor her people; as Mordecai had charged her: for Esther did the commandment of Mordecai, like as when she was brought up with him.

21 ¶ In those days, while Mordecai sat in the king's gate, two of the king's chamberlains, [n] Bigthan and Teresh, of those which kept the ‖ door, were wroth, [o] and sought to lay hand on the king Ahasuerus.

22 And [p] the thing was known to Mordecai, who told it unto Esther the queen; and [q] Esther certified the king thereof in [r] Mordecai's name.

23 And when inquisition was made of the matter, it was found out: therefore they were both [s] hanged on a tree: and it was written in [t] the book of the chronicles before the king.

had made known her nation, it might have interfered with her advancement to the rank of queen, as the Jews were generally despised; but she could not have avoided becoming one of Ahasuerus's concubines. Polygamy was connived at, by the Mosaic law; so that the situation of a concubine was not deemed dishonorable, or unlawful: and in her peculiar circumstances, the ritual law of not giving their daughters to those of another nation, might not be thought obligatory.—The conduct of Providence, however, should be chiefly noticed; though it does not appear that either Mordecai or Esther could have acted otherwise, if they had been inclined.

V. 11—14. Marg. Ref.—P. O. 1—14.

V. 15—17. About four years were spent, before another queen was chosen instead of Vashti: (1:3.) so long a time had been employed in collecting the virgins from all parts of Ahasuerus's dominions, and in other preparations which were thought requisite.—Ezra obtained his commission in the former part of this same year, if Artaxerxes were the same as Ahasuerus: (Note, Ezra 7:6—10.) and they who think, that Artaxerxes granted the desire of Ezra, through Esther's influence, suppose that Esther had been the favored concubine of the king, residing in his palace a considerable time before she was publicly made and crowned queen, which was in the tenth month of the seventh year of his reign.

V. 18. Marg. Ref.—Note, 1—3.

V. 19, 20. It is probable, that a number of virgins had been collected before Vashti was made queen; in relation to which it is here said, "When the virgins were gathered together the second time."—About this time Mordecai seems to have been appointed to some station in the service of the king: and the historian appears merely to have intended to connect the account of Mordecai's discovery of the treason, (21—23.) with Esther's advancement to be queen, as introductory to the subsequent narrative.—Esther, after her high preferment, still continued as attentive to Mordecai's command, as she had been before; out of gratitude for his kindness, and confidence in his wisdom, piety, and affection. 'A rare example of virtue, that she should be so 'observant of him, when she was a queen: for 'most forget what they were, when they are u'n 'expectedly grown very great.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 21—23. Many conjectures have been formed of the cause of this conspiracy, and the manner in which it was discovered; but curiosity alone is concerned in such inquiries, which after all end in uncertainty. It suffices for us to know, that a conspiracy was formed; that Mordecai detected it, and, by informing Esther, conveyed the intelligence to the king, that the criminals were convicted and executed; and that the account of it was written in the records of the kingdom. The transaction itself was nowise uncommon; but the event shewed the hand of God in it, in a most remarkable manner, and for the most important purposes. (Notes, 6:) 'Here 'we may see the infelicity and the danger of the 'most potent persons. The life of a great king 'depending on the fidelity of one single person, 'whose service was neglected by the court; though 'a memorial was made of it.' Pellicanus in Bp. Patrick.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

Resolutions formed in anger, and executed without deliberation, make work for bitter recollection and repentance. A wise man therefore will not proceed even to punish the guilty, till passion has subsided and reason resumed her sway.—The depravity of our nature, and the fallibility of our judgment, render it indispensable to our interest and happiness, that we should be allowed to change our sentiments and conduct, and correct our mistakes. Our gracious God has mercifully placed us under a dispensation, which admits of this: and though many painful effects must follow from transgression, we shall not be ruined by it, if we avail ourselves of this provision. (Ez. 18:30.) But while pride and obstinacy seem to arrogate infallibility, and to aspire to a dignity incompatible with fallen nature; they forfeit the real advantages of our situation, and leave a man without redress, exposed to all the fatal consequences of every false step. No one, however, should be too proud, to confess that he has been mistaken: and as this would preclude the absurdity of human laws, which must never be repealed or reversed; so it would strike at the root of that self-justifying, pertinacious temper, which induces sinners to neglect the gospel, and go on in sin. But even when men are in some measure made sensible of their folly and iniquity, new projects, amusements, and gratifications are devised, to silence conscience, and to carry them forward without uneasiness in the broad road of ungodliness.—The servants of mighty monarchs, though themselves princes and nobles, have often stooped to be pimps and parasites, in order to support their present authority, to purchase impunity for past crimes, or to procure future and still greater preferment! (P. O. Gen. 12:10—20, latter part.) But how degrading is it to our rational nature, that numbers of able men of superior rank, as well as of inferior station, should exert all their ingenuity and assiduity, in enabling an individual more devotedly to pamper those "fleshly lusts which war against the soul!" Even reason, (not to say religion,) if her voice could be heard, would command men to moderate and restrain their passions, and to teach them submission by habituating them to brook denial. But the higher human beings are advanced in authority, the lower they too generally sink into the most abject slavery to their sensual appetites: as if their superiority were intended merely as a medium for the more unrestrained licentiousness, and to enable them to be avowed in those excesses, which inferior libertines indulge with a more decent reserve!—How low is our nature sunk, when these are the leading pursuits, and the highest felicity, of many millions of rational creatures! when every consideration of decency, equity, and conscience; when domestic comfort, relative duties, and the natural rights of mankind; when even reputation, interest, and health; when life, and the immortal soul itself, are habitually sacrificed to such a base and hateful idol! Yet after a prostituted ingenuity has done its utmost, disappointment, vexation, and loathing must ensue: and that man most wisely consults even the enjoyment of this present life, who most exactly obeys the precepts of the divine law.—We ought also to be thankful for revelation, which is needful to teach us how to act in the common affairs of life. But without the supernatural teaching, inclining, and assisting influence of the Holy Spirit, men will not pay a due regard to that revelation: for, with the Bible in their hands, numbers deviate at least as widely from reason and scripture, as even the Persian monarchs did; except, as the want of power, and the laws of the land, restrain their licentiousness. For these laws indeed, and for many other advantages, we have great cause to be thankful: and especially, that the children of Britons are not liable to be forced into the Seraglio of any licentious ruler. Yet, alas! after all, who can bear steadily to contemplate the corrupt state of our favored nation, in this respect, without a mixture of shame, indignant regret, and consternation?

V. 15—23.

It is peculiarly useful to consider the providential conduct of God fulfilling his wise, faithful, righteous, and merciful purposes, in the midst of the extravagances occasioned by the mad passions of wicked men. He "careth for his people," and he is "the father of the fatherless:" orphans are often peculiarly favored in his providence, to encourage us to intrust our children to his care while we live, and when we are about to die and leave them.—It is our duty, in some cases, if we are able, to provide for the orphan children of our near relations; and by so doing, men often provide for their own comfort and safety, and for their families also.—The Lord not only confers personal and mental endowments, and enriches the soul with wisdom and grace; but he gives favor likewise: and, notwithstanding prejudices, and general contempt, he can, when he pleases, secure to his people the most endeared affection of those who know him not. If wealth or kingdoms were good for them, they would certainly have them; but prosperity too generally feeds the distempers of corrupt nature, and poverty and obscurity are more advantageous. Even those high stations, which some few believers occupy for the good of their brethren, will be their cross, if not their snare; and their comforts must flow from the same source, and be of the same nature, with those of the poorest Christian; and are generally in more scanty measure.—We ought, however, to be passive in the Lord's hands; and only be careful to avoid sin, and to perform our duty, in whatever station we are placed.—Our profession of religion, and many things relating to it, must often be regulated and timed according to circumstances; so that we not only need to regard the advice of wise and experienced Christians, but daily to ask for that wisdom which is from above, or we shall be liable to perpetual mistakes.—It is a singular proof that men have obtained a good measure of that wisdom, when unexpected prosperity and favor leave them humble and teachable, attentive to every relative duty, grateful to benefactors, and disposed to listen to prudent and pious counsellors.—No men are exposed to so great danger, from treachery, resentment, and ambition, as absolute monarchs: and their servants, when really attached, often confer obligations upon them, which they never can adequately compensate. But the servant of

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1. Haman is supposed to have been an Amalekite, descended from the stock of the ancient kings of that people, many of whom were named Agag. (Num. 24:7. 1 Sam. 15:8.) —If his descent was generally known, his advancement, to be the king's chief minister and favorite, would be peculiarly displeasing and alarming to the Jews; as they were expressly commanded to extirpate the Amalekites. (Notes, Ex. 17:14—16. Deut. 25:17—19. 1 Sam. 15:1—3.)

V. 2. It has been much disputed, why Mordecai so pertinaciously and absolutely refused to bow before Haman, when commanded by his prince: and many, supposing that nothing more was meant than civil obeisance, such as Joseph's brethren and the Egyptians rendered to him, and such as they suppose Ezra, and Nehemiah, and even Daniel, must have paid to the Persian kings, have ascribed Mordecai's refusal to his contempt of Haman's character, or his dislike to him as an Amalekite. But these reasons are not sufficient to justify his conduct, when the fate of the whole nation was at stake: yet he evidently acted conscientiously, and was accepted by the Lord. We must not therefore ascribe his behavior to pride, moroseness, resentment, or envy. It is well known, that the Persian monarchs required an obeisance, which even the Greeks often refused or evaded, as express adoration: and it is not at all unlikely, that Ahasuerus required a similar act of adoration to be offered to his favorite. 'To bow the 'knee or the body, to all great persons, was a common respect; for which there needed not a particular command, ... with respect of Haman. ... There was therefore some kind of divine 'honor intended, such as was paid to the Persian 'kings themselves, to whom the Greeks would 'not pay this sort of respect, because it was ac-'counted divine. And the word reverence imports 'something beyond bowing; which was falling flat 'on their faces to the ground.' Bp. Patrick.—The original words may be rendered, "They kneeled down and fell prostrate before Haman," or, they worshipped him: and perhaps the two expressions are never united, except when adoration is expressly meant, and they are in this narrative uniformly united. (Matt. 4:9. Acts 10:25,26. Rev. 22:8,9.)—In the apocryphal addition to this book, Mordecai is introduced as thus appealing to God: 'Thou knowest, Lord, that 'it was neither in contempt, nor pride, nor for 'any desire of glory, that I did not bow down to 'proud Haman: for I could have been content, 'with good will, for the salvation of Israel, to kiss 'the soles of his feet: but I did this, that I might 'not prefer the glory of man above the glory of 'God, neither will I worship any but thee.' (Esther 13:12—14.) Indeed it is most probable that the homage required by Haman was idolatrous: and we may reasonably conclude, that the king himself dispensed with the customary ceremonies, out of regard to the conscientious scruples of those few Jews, who were admitted into his presence, and whom he peculiarly favored; but that Haman, despising Mordecai and hating his people, was not so condescending. And though we do not read that other Jews refused Haman this honor; yet numbers might be of the same opinion, who were not put to the trial, not being employed in any places of honor or profit about the king: and indeed it does not appear that Mordecai was blamed by any of them, even amidst the most imminent danger to which the whole nation was exposed. (Note, Dan. 3:1—7.)

V. 3—5. Haman seems not to have noticed Mordecai's singularity, (amidst the homage which he received from all others,) till it was pointed out to him by the other servants of Ahasuerus. These first remonstrated with Mordecai for his disobedience to the king: but when he disregarded them, they desired to know whether "his matters would stand; for he had told them that he was a Jew." 'He acquaints them plainly of what 'religion and nation he was; who might not ... 'worship any but God alone.' Bp. Patrick. This proves, that he vindicated himself on the ground of his religion: and it implies, that he expected Ahasuerus would admit of this plea; which favors the supposition, that the kings of Persia had been used to excuse their Jewish servants from such obeisance, as they could not conscientiously render.—It is probable, however, that these informers thought this a good opportunity of paying court to the favorite; or of obtaining Mordecai's post for some of them, or their dependents; and they did not approve of his singularity, by which he seemed to reproach their compliance.

V. 6. A wise man would have treated this information with neglect: and, had he even thought that Mordecai's conduct was the effect of pique, pride, malice, or insolence, he would have left him to his humor. But Haman was a man of a weak and vain-glorious mind, and intoxicated with prosperity, as the whole history shews. Being therefore fired with indignation, that these honors were refused him by one so greatly his inferior, and having understood that the refusal was dictated by principles, which were common to all the Jews; he considered the whole nation as his enemies, and determined, if possible, to involve them all in one common destruction. (Note, Ps. 83:1—4.)—The ancient enmity of an Amalekite seems also to have revived; and perhaps he meant to revenge the quarrel of his nation, as well as the affront which he had received from Mordecai. His rank and authority, and his unbounded influence over Ahasuerus, emboldened him to expect success in the daring attempt. His self-importance made him think it a mean revenge, to crush an individual who had offended him: and his pre-eminence seemed only to suggest the idea of being able to do more mischief, and diffuse more extensive misery, than an inferior could have done. His diabolical ambition and cruelty thirsted for the extirpation of the whole people of the Jews at one blow; at least all of them who dwelt in the immense kingdom of Persia, including those in Judea, which was a province of that kingdom. (Note, Ezra 2:1.) It may therefore fairly be concluded that the device was not his own; but was suggested by that ambitious spirit, who aspires to be "the god of this world," who has been "a murderer from the beginning," and whose enmity to the "Seed of the woman," to Christ and his church, is communicated to all his children. In this view, it was a plan worthy of the vast capacity, enmity, malice, ambition, and desperation of that arch rebel against his Maker. (Notes, Gen. 3:14,15. Matt. 4:1,2. John 8:41—47, v. 44.)

V. 7. Esther had now been queen five years; yet her nation and kindred had not become publicly known: for Haman did not suspect that the queen was a Jewess, or that Mordecai was her near relation. (Note, 7:6.) Had Mordecai been ambitious of preferment, no doubt he would have counselled Esther to make known her kindred, when she was first in high favor: but he seems to have foreseen, that she was advanced for some future service to her people, for which she ought to reserve herself. (Note, 4:13,14.)—The word "Pur" signifies the lot. Haman, having formed his project, inquired of his idols, according to his own superstition, by casting lots what day would be most propitious to its execution: for he made himself sure of the king's concurrence! and it pleased God, so to order it, that the day which had the favorable token, was above eleven months distant. Haman's superstition was such, that he did not venture to execute his design till that time came: though it can hardly be supposed, but he must have perceived, that many things might occur to prevent the execution of his intentions. The king might change his mind, or might die; or the Jews might take refuge in other countries, or make such preparations for their own defence, as to render the attempt most perilous, and the success of it very hazardous.—The event shewed the vanity of his oracles or auguries; and illustrated the doctrine of a particular providence over all the affairs of men, and the care of God over his church. 'This whole business 'was governed by a wonderful providence of God, 'by whom these lots were directed, and not by 'the Persian gods, to fall in the last month of the 'year; whereby almost a whole year intervened 'between the design and its execution; and gave 'time for Mordecai to acquaint Esther with it, 'and for her to intercede with the king, for the 'revoking or suspending his decree, and disappointing the conspiracy.' Bp. Patrick. (Note, Prov. 16:33.)

V. 8, 9. Haman does not seem even to have mentioned to Ahasuerus the name of the people, whom he purposed to extirpate; supposing that they would be sufficiently known from his description of them. He probably acted as prime-minister under the king, who, like most of those eastern monarchs, giving himself up to his pleasures, left the management of his affairs almost entirely to him. Indeed the ascendency of Haman was so absolute, that none of the other counsellors seem to have been advised with in this most important matter; and probably the proposal was made and consented to, while the king was heated with wine. (Note, 2:1.)—The laws and customs of the people of God were indeed diverse from those of any other nation: but there is no proof, that they refused obedience to the laws of Persia, except as Mordecai refused to worship Haman; for we do not find that the kings of Persia required them to worship idols, or even forbad them to observe their sabbaths, festivals, and ceremonial institutions.—It does not appear from the narrative, that the horrible cruelty and injustice of the proposal at all startled the king! Indeed Haman seems to have been more apprehensive, that he would object to the impolicy of diminishing the revenue, by decreasing the number of his subjects. He therefore offered the king ten thousand talents of silver, (about four millions sterling, if reckoned according to the talent of the Jews' Tables,) by way of compensation for the loss. But it seems, that he meant to indemnify himself out of the property of the massacred Jews: and he would engage to raise the sum at once from the execution of his project; which would, as he pretended, be more than equivalent to all present or subsequent disadvantages. 'He intended not to pay one far-'thing of it himself, it being easy to raise it out of 'the spoil of the Jews' goods.' Bp. Patrick. Those who were employed in executing the bloody decree, were required "to take the spoil of them for a prey;" (13) out of which he would require them to pay a certain proportion to "those who had the charge of the business" of collecting the revenue, "to bring it into the king's treasuries."

V. 10, 11. Without considerable knowledge of the human heart, and the history of mankind, we shall find a difficulty in conceiving, how any prince could be induced to consent to so horrid and pernicious a proposal, without objection or hesitation. It would be absurd to assign a reason for so infatuated a measure. But when an arbitrary monarch has become the dupe of a wicked favorite; it has always been observed, that the first object of his life, the chief, and almost the only use, which he makes of his power, is to gratify and aggrandize him: and the lives of subjects, or the interests of empires, have, on such occasions, often been wantonly sacrificed to the avarice, the ambition, the revenge, or the caprice, of a worthless minion!—'So loth are men that love their pleas-'ure, to take any pains to distinguish between 'truth and falsehood.' Bp. Patrick.—As a token that the request was granted, Ahasuerus gave the ring, with his royal signet, from his own hand, to the enemy and oppressor of the Jews; and he also granted to him all the spoil, without making any payment into the treasury: thus Haman seemed about to obtain the most complete gratification of his revenge, ambition, and avarice. (Notes, Ex. 15:9,10. Is. 10:13—15. Luke 12:15—21.)

V. 12—15. Haman hasted to form the grant of the king into a decree, and to publish it throughout the empire: that the sentence might be looked upon as irreversible; and that all the subjects might prepare to carry it into execution, as they valued the favor of the king, and of his minister. Thus he expected, that the hope of ingratiating themselves at court, and the enmity borne the Jews, would unite the inhabitants of every city and province, in this bloody massacre: doubtless he intended to stir them up, and lead them to the attack. by his emissaries; and, further to encourage them, it seems probable, that they were allowed to take the whole spoil of the Jews to themselves as a prey. That his meaning might not be mistaken, he caused the edict to be drawn up with a remarkable repetition, and almost in the style of modern law; and the inhabitants of every province were expressly commanded, "to destroy, kill, and cause to perish," all the Jews, even old men, and women, and children, in one day.—When this strange and most horrid decree was published, it caused much perplexity and consternation, not only to the Jews, but to all considerate men, especially at Shushan: for they could not but tremble for themselves, when they perceived what a bloody tyrant had possession of authority; and they must foresee, that terrible effects would follow from such a mad and rash attempt, which would render an immense number of people desperate, and drive them to the most furious courage in their own defence. 'Perhaps some of them were re-'lated to the Jews, or had made friendship with 'them; and therefore were much concerned at 'this horrid decree.' Bp. Patrick. But Haman was insersible to every thing, except the gratification of his revenge: and in order to keep such reflections and reports at a distance from the king, he engaged him in pleasure and indulgence; and they sat down to drink, as perfectly unconcerned in the event!—Eleven months intervened, between the publishing of the decree, and the day appointed for carrying it into execution. 'This was not wisely projected, to let his design be 'known so long before it was to take effect: for 'the king's mind might alter, or the Jews might 'find some way to deliver themselves, or might 'steal out of the kingdom.' Bp. Patrick.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

The favorites of earthly princes have too often been distinguished by their folly, pride, and profligacy: but those of the King of heaven are endowed with wisdom and grace, and prepared for usefulness in their several situations.—The vanity and comparative worthlessness of earthly dignities and possessions are shewn, by their being so commonly lavished upon the basest of the human species; "God having provided better things" for the objects of his special love.—The poison of the old serpent, infused by his first temptation, "Ye shall be as gods," still rankles in the human heart; and when the pride of man is emboldened by great prosperity, it is capable of openly affecting the honor and worship, which belong to God alone! (Notes, Gen. 3:4,5. Ez. 28: 2—5. P. O. 1—10. Notes, Dan. 6:6—9. Acts 12:20—23.) We are all by nature idolatrous, and self is the most favorite of our idols: and whilst we admire and glory in our own supposed excellences, we delight that others should join the incense of their adulation; we are pleased to be treated, as if every thing were at our disposal, and within the reach of our capacity, and that all around should submit to us and bow before us. And when this vast ambition occupies a narrow mind, and the possessor climbs the pinnacle of earthly grandeur, he forgets that he is a man; and acts as if the world were made for him, and were to be governed by him; and as if all its inhabitants were created to be his slaves, and to worship at his shrine!—The desire of the favor of monarchs, and the fear of their wrath, influence most men to allow of these arrogant claims, and to conform to this strange idolatry: and those princes, who have literally demanded altars, sacrifices, and incense to their own deity, have generally met with a ready and zealous compliance from most of their subjects. But the true believer can neither obey such edicts and conform to such fashions, nor be induced, by any persuasions or menaces, to violate the law of God, or the dictates of his own conscience. He must "obey God, rather than men," and leave the consequences to him; and whether "his matters will stand," and his religion excuse his disobedience to unlawful commands, in human courts of justice, or not, he will certainly be justified in so doing before the tribunal of God.—Who can know the desperate wickedness of the human heart, or prescribe any bounds to its devices! When a man possesses the dangerous privilege of doing as he pleases, without control, and with present impunity; when pride and ambition meet with an unexpected repulse, and when indignation and revenge occupy the heart; the most horrible and diabolical designs will be considered, as the evidences of a noble and daring mind. In such circumstances, the infuriated wretch will think scorn of the petty rapines and assassinations of inferior villains, and become ambitious of being as much distinguished by a vast revenge, as by the eminence of his rank: and what massacres and crimes will not in that case be perpetrated without remorse, and even with pride and pleasure; while immense numbers both fall victims to his fury, and are involved with him in the guilt of murder and other enormities! What cause then have we to be thankful for external restraints to our headstrong passions; and how ought we to watch and pray against pride, anger, malice, and every sinful propensity! for if left under the power of them, we cannot conceive how far they would hurry us.—Let us also remember to be thankful for a limited, mild, and equitable government; and to beg of God to extend the same blessing to all other nations; with all the blessings of our holy religion, and that liberty with which Christ makes his people free.

V. 7—15.

The world, as lying in wickedness, must hate the people of God, who bear his image and do his will: but they will be peculiarly obnoxious to tyrants; as they must refuse unreserved compliance with their mandates and humors; being the subjects of another kingdom, and governed by laws diverse from, nay opposite to, their favorite maxims and pursuits. They are indeed, and ought to be, "a peculiar" and singular "people," "not conformed to this world," while they are dispersed in the various parts of it: and they should be willing to be treated as precise, conceited, and unpliant. But those who persuade princes, that it is not for their profit to tolerate them, and that they had better persecute, destroy, or banish them, are as much enemies to the state, as to the church of God. Whatever mere professors may be, true Christians are the best subjects under every government: not only because they are more peaceable, honest, and industrious than their neighbors; and conscientiously pay tribute, and render obedience in all things lawful; but because their examples and conversation edify many, and their prayers bring down a blessing upon the land in which they live in peace. No acquisitions of wealth therefore could compensate the loss of them, even in a political view; and without bringing into the account the enormous load of national guilt, which persecution rapidly accumulates.—The ungodly are often lavish in expenses on their lusts; and thus shame those Christians who are penurious in promoting the cause of God: they, however, frequently find means by one of their crimes to bear the expenses of the rest; and it is through defect of ingenuity or of power, if they do not always accomplish this.—Inconsiderate princes, who are the slaves of pleasure and dupes to their favorites, may, though humane in their own dispositions, become as mischievous as the most bloody tyrants; by consenting, through false accusations, to that injustice and cruelty which they would have abhorred, if they had taken the pains properly to investigate the business. Thus the most important interests of millions are sacrificed to the humor, emolument, or revenge of some worthless wretch; who regards the honor of his patron no more than he does the happiness of the people, and is as insensible to gratitude, as to compassion. But we may cease to wonder that such things have been done, when we consider how individuals, in every station of life, sacrifice their credit, interest, health, and connexions, and even shorten their lives, as well as ruin their souls, for the sake of the most contemptible gratifications: and though sensible of their danger, they have no power to resist the importunity of an inordinate, unreasonable inclination! When this becomes the case of one in authority, and unites with his other passions and partialities; intoxication and excess extinguish every remaining spark of humanity, and stupify conscience and reflection; and he and his companions will be revelling with unfeeling and most unseasonable mirth, while thousands are deploring the fatal effects of their pernicious counsels.—But the Lord bounds the effects of man's malice, as he does the raging waves of the ocean: even superstition, though baneful in itself, may sometimes operate as a useful restraint on those who are free from every other; and it has often so dismayed unprincipled men, in the full career of prosperous wickedness, that they have postponed their designs, till opportunity has been given to render them abortive. Thus "the counsel of the LORD shall stand, and

NOTES.

Chap. IV. V. 1. (Marg. Ref.) Mordecai, besides giving vent to his own sorrows, by his open lamentations, and by the habit of a penitent mourner, doubtless intended to excite the attention of his people to the extent and imminence of their danger, and to the proper method of seeking deliverance. Probably, he was one of the most considerable Jews in Shushan, and immediately struck at by the decree: therefore he thus avowed his relation to the Jews, and called upon them to unite in seeking protection from God.

V. 2. Nothing was allowed to enter within the palace, which did not bear the aspect of joy and pleasure, or which could remind the king of misery or mortality. (Note, Gen. 50:4.) Thus, whatever oppressions were committed upon the subjects, all complaints were discouraged, and care was taken to prevent the king from being troubled with the report of them. Mordecai, therefore, when expressing his grief by the customary tokens, might not enter to his usual place of attendance: but he walked as near it as he could, that being noticed, Esther might hear of him; through whom he doubtless entertained hopes of deliverance. (Notes, 13,14. 2:21—23.)

V. 3. It cannot be reasonably doubted, that the fastings and weepings of the Jews were attended by constant prayers and supplications: yet all mention of them, and of the glorious God whom they worshipped, seems to have been carefully and purposely avoided, both here and elsewhere. (Preface.)

V. 4. Some of the queen's attendants were, it seems, acquainted with her relation to Mordecai; and his excessive grief being noticed, she soon heard of it. As a token of her sincere and deep sympathy with him in his sorrow, and her unabated affection for so kind a benefactor, she sent him change of raiment, according to the custom of the times; in order perhaps, that he might resume his place: but she seems not to have known the cause of his affliction; and his refusal to be comforted would lead her to conclude, that it was for some very great and terrible calamity. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5. The wives and concubines of the Persian kings were watched with such jealous strictness, that the queen herself had not liberty to go out of the precincts of the palace, to confer in person with so near a relative; nor might he have access to her, especially in mourning! So that she could only inquire the cause of his excessive sorrow, by the interposition of one of the chamberlains, whom the king had appointed to attend on her. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6—9. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, 3:2—15.) Mordecai told Hatach, in what manner Haman's revenge was excited, and of the proposal, which he had made to the king of paying ten thousand talents into the treasury, if a decree might be passed for destroying all the Jews; and that such a decree had been ratified, of which he sent a copy to Esther; and he charged her to intercede with the king in behalf of her nation.

V. 11. It may be supposed, that this law was framed, under the pretext of securing the person of the king from the assaults of conspirators, and of maintaining his dignity; that being seldom seen, he might be considered as a kind of deity: but it would serve also to protect his ministers and favorites from detection, in their oppressions 13 Then Mordecai commanded to answer Esther, [s] Think not with thyself that thou shalt escape in the king's house, more than all the Jews.

14 For, if thou altogether holdest thy peace at this time, [t] then shall there * enlargement and deliverance arise to the Jews from another place; but [u] thou and thy father's house shall be destroyed: and who knoweth [x] whether thou art come to the kingdom [y] for such a time as this?

or pernicious measures. For in general the king must see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and receive their reports: and if any one would venture to present to him a complaint, petition, appeal, or information, he must do it at the hazard of his life; as the king would seldom call for any person, in opposition to the advice of his counsellors and ministers. By this method the king also was excluded from liberal society and converse; so that his palace in the city, and his pavilions in the camp, became a kind of prison: and no wonder, that princes who were so immured, became morose and capricious, and prepared for every kind of tyranny and cruelty. (Notes, Neh. 2:1,2. Dan. 6:6—9.)—As the law extended to the women likewise, we may suppose that this was intended to free the monarch from molestation, when his affections had been transferred from former objects to more successful rivals: for if the queen went into his presence uncalled, immediate death was the inevitable consequence, should he be displeased at her intrusion. And as Esther had not been called for during a whole month, she had some reason to fear that she had lost the king's favor; and that she should also lose her life, if she presumed to enter uncalled into his presence.—Probably, Haman had occupied the king's mind with every species of licentious pleasure, that he might think no further of the edict, which he had confirmed and published.

V. 13, 14. Mordecai represented to Esther, that in case the decree against her people should be executed, she would certainly be known to be a Jewess, and would be slain even in the king's palace, by some of the envious and malicious enemies of that nation. But, being "strong in faith," he was assured, that God would by some means deliver his people; and that, if she refused to venture her life in the cause, their enlargement would be attended by some remarkable judgment upon her, and all her remaining relations. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Prov. 24:11,12. Matt. 16:24—28.) He also suggested to her, that most probably she had been advanced to her present dignity, on purpose to be the deliverer of her nation in this perilous crisis, and in this case, her attempt would be both safe and honorable.—It is remarkable that sentiments, so replete with faith and piety, are conveyed to us, without the mention of God, or Providence. This seems to have been done intentionally. (Preface.)

V. 15—17. (Marg. Ref.) Some think that the Jews were only required to abstain from all delicacies, and to fast each day till after sun-set: but perhaps on this extraordinary occasion, all, who had no hindrance that rendered it impracticable, (in which situation many must needs be found,) fasted from the morning of the first, until some time on the third day, without eating any thing. (Notes, Dan. 10:2,3. Joel 1:13—15. 2:15—17. Jon. 3:5—10.) The queen herself, however, conformed to the same rule which she prescribed to others: and she had obtained some attendants, who were willing to unite with her in these exercises of devotion, though it is not probable, that they were Jewesses. And when preparation had been made, by solemn humiliation before God, no doubt accompanied by fervent, united, and persevering prayer, she determined, by an heroic act of faith and love, to venture her life in the cause of her people: and if it were the will of the Lord, that she should be put to death, she was ready to acquiesce in his appointment. 'This is not a speech of de-'spondence, but of courage and resolution; being 'as much as to say, I am content to perish in so 'good a cause: and if I perish for it in this world, '(as the Targum glosses,) I shall have my portion 'in the world to come.' Bp. Patrick. (Notes, Neh. 6:10—14. Acts 20:22—24. Phil. 2:24—30. 1 John 3:16,17.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

Public calamities, especially those which oppress the church of God, should more affect our hearts than any private affliction: and it is peculiarly distressing to a generous mind, to be even the occasion of suffering to others.—Vain is the attempt of man to banish misery from his heart, by any of those varied devices which he tries for that purpose. A refuge from the wrath to come is indeed provided; and an effectual support under temporal afflictions, and victory over death itself: but most men content themselves with striving to forget their misery, instead of seeking and securing happiness. Yet the approach of death, as well as its consequences, must be formidable, in proportion as it is unexpected and unprepared for.—Exalted stations, and envied distinctions, in many respects, greatly abridge the liberty of the possessors, and preclude them from the most agreeable and profitable society. Pride, envy, suspicion, and other unreasonable passions, render them slaves to cumbrous forms; and to preserve their dignity, or from fear of giving offence, they often have less opportunity of enjoyment or improvement, than their inferiors, and become the ignorant dupes of designing men in matters of the greatest importance. Too often laws also are framed in subserviency to men's lusts: and under every government, the more cause is given for

CHAP. V.

Esther, venturing uncalled before the king, is graciously received; and, being encouraged to make her request, she invites the king and Haman to a banquet, 1—5. Being again asked what was her request, she invites them to another banquet the next day, 6—8. Haman, proud of this distinction, and elated by prosperity, is yet disquieted by Mordecai's neglect, and amidst his vain-glorying complains of it to his friends and his wife, 9—13. By their advice he erects a gallows for Mordecai's execution the next morning, 14.

NOW it came to pass [a] on the third day, that Esther put on her [b] royal apparel, and stood [c] in the inner court of the king's house, over against the king's house: and the king [d] sat upon his royal throne in the royal house, over against the gate of the house.

complaint, the less liberty is allowed to complain.—But let us rejoice that the righteous Lord reigns, and upon a mercy-seat. To him we have access at all times: his golden sceptre is ever held forth to encourage our approach: we cannot come uncalled into his presence, when we plead the Savior's name; our danger consists in keeping at too great a distance, not in drawing too near: if he have taken us for the objects of his peculiar love, he will never cast us off; and it is our own fault if we have not daily access to him and communion with him. We never have any good reason to complain of his dispensations; though we have frequently cause to bemoan our afflictions, to deprecate the miseries to which we are exposed, and to appeal to him against our oppressors, persecutors, and tempters: and we are charged to present our daily petitions at his throne of grace, for the whole church of God and all the members of it, according to their several difficulties, trials, and services; as well as for the conversion and salvation of our fellow sinners. For this purpose, we should inquire concerning the state of our brethren, how they fare, and of the cause of God, how it prospers; that we may be directed in our prayers, and in our endeavors to serve the common cause by the due improvement of our talents. And if we be thus disposed, we shall seldom want opportunities of comforting the mourners, protecting the oppressed, or succoring those who are in tribulation or necessity.

V. 10—17.

As the enemies of the church are instigated by malice to be unwearied in mischief, surely we should be constrained by love to be as unwearied in doing good. But we are prone to shrink from perilous and self-denying services: and to think ourselves sufficiently excused for neglecting an opportunity of important usefulness, if we can truly say, that it would have been embraced at the hazard of liberty or life. Yet, as the disciples of him who laid down his life for us, we ought also, if properly called to it, "to lay down our lives for the brethren:" and no labor, loss, or suffering in the way, will justify us in neglecting the duty of our station. If then Christians, who are placed in exalted situations, shew a disposition to consult their own ease and safety rather than the public good, they should be plainly remonstrated with, and reminded that their interest and that of God's people are inseparable; that their enemies are the same; that he, who sinfully determines "to save his life, shall lose it;" that enlargement and deliverance will arise to the church of God from some quarter; that if they, from selfish motives, refuse the privilege of being his instruments, the honor will be given to others, and disgrace or ruin will come upon them and theirs, for deserting the cause when the emergency called for their interposition; that Providence has raised them to their high stations, that they may serve God, and do good to mankind, and will they then neglect the opportunity which is presented to them? that, perhaps, this was the very service for which they were raised up; and it is preposterous to fear man in doing the evident will of God. Such remonstrances, when urged by men of consistent character, have a powerful effect, in exciting the timorous and reluctant to venture in a good cause.—Those, however, who are called to stand forth boldly in perilous services, have a right to demand the united prayers of all their brethren. And, in great emergencies and adversities especially, solemn seasons of fasting, humiliation, and prayer are peculiarly useful, to prepare the mind for expecting and receiving deliverance from the mercy of God, in a proper manner.—Believers may have fellowship with each other in the same duties, when not able to meet in the same place.—Those who stir up others to self-denial should set the example of it: and a winning deportment, a pious conversation, and a holy life, will generally induce others to join us in seeking the Lord, wherever we are placed (Note, Acts 10:3—8, v. 7.) Having solemnly commended our souls and our cause to God, we may venture under his protection upon any service, without distressing fear: we are perfectly safe, if he please to preserve us; and should we lose our lives in doing his will, that loss would be our greatest gain.—Indeed all dangers are trivial, compared to the danger of losing our souls. When this is apprehended, the trembling sinner is often as much afraid of casting himself, without reserve, upon the Lord's free mercy, as Esther was of coming before the king. But let him venture, as she did, with earnest prayers and supplications, saying, "If I perish, I perish," and he shall certainly succeed in the event. And as the cause of God will at last be triumphant, it is our highest interest cordially to adhere to it, whatever cross we may be required to endure.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1—3. Esther, having intrusted herself to the protection of God, and put on her royal apparel, ventured into the presence of the king; most probably before the conclusion of the solemn fast, and while the Jews were still engaged in prayer. Her conduct was contrary to the law of the Persians: but the king, by holding forth the golden sceptre, granted her a pardon; and by his subsequent inquiry and promise, relieved her anxiety and raised her expectations (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Gen. 32:6—8,24—28. 33:4

Haman come this day unto [k] the banquet, that I have prepared for him.

5 Then the king said, [l] Cause Haman to make haste, that he may do as Esther hath said. So the king and Haman came to the banquet that Esther had prepared.

6 And [m] the king said unto Esther at the banquet of wine, What is thy petition? and it shall be granted thee: and what is thy request? even to the half of the kingdom it shall be performed.

7 Then answered Esther, and said, My petition and my request is;

8 If I have found favor in the sight of the king, and if it please the king to grant my petition, and to * perform my request, let the king and Haman come to the banquet that I shall prepare for them, and I will do [n] to-morrow as the king hath said.

9 ¶ Then went Haman forth that day, [o] joyful, and with a glad heart: but when Haman saw Mordecai in the king's gate, that [p] he stood not up, nor moved for him, [q] he was full of indignation against Mordecai.

10 Nevertheless Haman [r] refrained himself: and when he came home, he sent and † called for his friends, and [s] Zeresh his wife.

11 And Haman told them of [t] the glory of his riches, and [u] the multitude of his children, and all the things wherein the king had promoted him, and [x] how he had advanced him above the princes and servants of the king.

12 Haman said moreover, Yea, Esther the queen did let no man come in with the king unto the banquet that she had prepared, but myself; and [y] to-morrow am I invited unto her also with the king.

13 Yet [z] all this availeth me nothing, so long as I see Mordecai the Jew sitting at the king's gate.

14 Then [a] said Zeresh his wife, and all his friends unto him, [b] Let a ‡ gallows be made of fifty cubits high, and to-morrow [c] speak thou unto the king that Mordecai may be hanged thereon: then [d] go thou in merrily with the king unto the banquet. And [e] the thing pleased Haman; and [f] he caused the gallows to be made.

V. 4. It appears probable, that Esther intended to make a previous trial of the king's disposition, before she presented her important petition, which could scarcely be granted without the immediate ruin of his principal favorite. It might also be improper to make her request before the king's attendants; and she meant to do it in the presence of Haman. The delay likewise expressed her respect for the king, whom she reluctantly troubled, because the matter was urgent: and probably she well knew that blandishments, and the exhilaration of wine and feasting, disposed him to grant such petitions as he would otherwise have rejected.

V. 5—8. (Marg. Ref.) Whether Esther's courage failed her, or whether she had some good reason for this delay; the providential wisdom of God was wonderfully manifested by it, as the event sufficiently shews. 'There was also a singular 'providence of God in this matter, which so dis-'posed her mind, that the high honor the king be-'stowed on Mordecai the next day, might fall out 'between this and that, and make way for her pe-'tition. ... The Israelites were in great expecta-'tion of the issue of this feasting, and hoped to see 'Haman suddenly cut off: but she was resolved to 'turn their thoughts the right way, that is, from 'her unto God, looking for mercy from their heav-'enly Father.' Bp. Patrick and Targum quoted by him. (Notes, 6:)

V. 9, 10. Mordecai had before refused Haman the exorbitant honors which he claimed: but now he "stood not up, nor moved for him," which, probably he had before done; for Haman's prodigious wickedness rendered him unworthy even of common respect. Mordecai would also shew this base man, that, so far from abject submission from dread of his cruel revenge, he had trusted his cause with God, and did not "fear what flesh could do to him." But Haman, though full of indignant wrath, refrained himself for the present. —It seems that at the close of the solemn fast, Mordecai had hasted to put off his sackcloth, and to be found in his place. (Notes, 1—3 2:21—23. 4:1,2.)

V. 11, 12. Haman's wife and friends must have before known all the particulars of his prosperity: but he loved, it seems, to be talking on these subjects; and the queen's invitation, which he supposed to spring from peculiar esteem and respect, was a recent distinction which greatly flattered his pride.

V. 13. The neglect of Mordecai, by Haman's own confession, more than counterbalanced all his singular prosperity, and marred all his enjoyment. His proud heart rankled with malice and impatience, because this Jew still lived, kept his place, and refused to bow unto him. The destruction of the nation was determined on at a distant day; but he thirsted for Mordecai's blood, as an anticipation of that more complete revenge.— 'How small a matter will spoil all the satisfaction 'of those, who are arrived at the top of human fe-'licity! Immense riches, glory, and honor, gave 'not Haman so much pleasure, as he felt pain from 'one man's disrespect.' Bp. Patrick.

CHAP. VI.

The king, unable to sleep, orders the records of the kingdom to be read, 1; and discovering that Mordecai's service had not been rewarded, he considers how to honor him, 2, 3. Haman, coming early to request that Mordecai might be hanged, is himself appointed to confer the highest honors upon him, 4—11. He is extremely cast down, and distressed; his friends and wife predict his ruin; and in this state of mind he is called to attend Esther's banquet, 12—14.

ON [a] that night *could not the king sleep, and he commanded to bring [b] the book of records of the chronicles; and they were read before the king.

2 And it was found written that Mordecai had told of [c] Bigthana and Teresh, two of the king's chamberlains, the keepers of the †door, who sought to lay hand on the king Ahasuerus.

3 And the king said, [d] What honor and dignity hath been done to Mordecai for this? Then said the king's servants that ministered unto him, [e] There is nothing done for him.

that being so deeply chagrined, he could not enjoy the royal banquet, if he did not previously gratify his malice by the death of Mordecai. They were confident, that at the first word the king would consent to Mordecai's execution; and they advised the immediate erection of a gibbet for that purpose, that no time might be lost: and, in order that all men might witness the death of him, who refused honor to the king's favorite, it must be more then twenty-five yards high! This cruel and foolish counsel was calculated to please Haman; and though night was approaching, the gallows was immediately prepared: but little did he dream for whom it was erected. (Notes, 7:9,10. 9:13,14.) 'The Jews were extremely troubled at the 'sight of these gallows, and all cried to God in the 'words of the Psalmist, 123:2. "Behold, as the eyes 'of servants look unto the hand of their masters, and 'as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her mis-'tress; so our eyes wait upon the LORD our God, 'until that he have mercy upon us."' Targum in Bp. Patrick. The text selected is apposite; ut the rest is the mere imagination of the writer.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In those things which must be done, and which require great courage, needless delays should be avoided: and it is best to proceed when our affections are lively, and our faith in exercise.—Costly or royal apparel is not the Christian's ornament, and is utterly worthless when compared with wisdom and grace: yet, on some occasions and in some stations, it may and ought to be worn. (Notes, 1 Tim. 2:8—10. 1 Pet. 3:1—4.) But it is a most deplorable evil that inferior persons will ape the fashions, and emulate the expense, of their superiors: and thus they often injure their families and creditors, or lavish that which belongs to the poor; and at the same time expose their own weakness and folly.—The best method of prevailing with men, is first to prevail with God by earnest prayer; for he can dispose the heart of any prince or persecutor, to favor his people, as far as he pleases. Yet while we trust in his omnipotent protection, we should be wise as well as courageous: and he will generally teach those who consult him, to conciliate men's affections by attention and respect, and to watch for favorable opportunities before they propose important matters. But, however largely men may profess or promise, it is best not to ask or expect too much from them.—A slight affront, which a humble man would scarcely notice, will torment a proud man even to madness, destroy all his comforts, and sometimes fill him with diabolical rage and misery. Vain-glorious men delight in boasting of the commendations, honors, and favors conferred on them; each new distinction gives a momentary gratification to their vanity; and they receive every attention, as a tribute to their merit, or as homage paid to their superior talents. They invite, and even hire men, to listen to their praises; and often glory most in those things, which tend to their immediate disgrace and ruin. For "vanity and vexation" are at last the inventory of all sublunary things. All "availeth them nothing," while this is wanted, or the other wrong; a beloved child or friend is dead, or an enemy lives and prospers; while some are mounted higher themselves, and others refuse to render them the most servile flattery, and comply with their capricious and unreasonable demands. (Notes and P. O. 1 Kings 21:1—7.) Prosperity increases insolence and arrogance, which stir up envy and enmity, and provoke affronts and opposition; and thus the most envenomed resentments and tormenting passions are excited, and the fair edifice of fancied felicity vanishes, like the enchanted castles of romantic poets. May we then seek happiness in the favor of God, in peace of conscience, and dominion over our own spirits; and in cultivating that love, which "suffereth long and is kind, ... envieth not, vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own; is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil; rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth; beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things; and which never faileth," but shall be perfected in the eternal felicity of heaven! (Note, 1 Cor. 13:5—7.)

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1, 2. No reason is assigned why Ahasuerus was not able to sleep: but the Lord so ordered it, that sleep fled from him: (marg.) and instead of calling for the ministers of his pleasure to entertain him, he was disposed to examine the records of his kingdom! It does not appear, that he had any express intention, in having recourse to this extraordinary way of employing his sleepless hours, during the night: but the only wise God so appointed it. And he likewise so ordered it, that the reader opened the records in that part, in which Mordecai's important service was written! (Note, 2:21—23.) Had not this circumstance intervened, Haman no doubt would have prevailed in his request against Mordecai; and this would have been extremely unfavorable to the success of Esther's petition for her people, and against Haman. (Note, 5:14.)

V. 3. Instead of a reward, Mordecai, and all his people for his sake, were actually condemned to die! Probably some recompense had been intended: but so unassuming a person, who would not cringe and flatter, and who presented no requests for preferment, was soon forgotten by a mighty prince, surrounded by his courtiers and pleasures, and engrossed by a multiplicity of affairs. (Notes, Gen. 40:23. 1 Sam. 17:55—58. 2 Sam. 9:1. Ec. 9:13—18. Luke 17:11—19.)—'But 'there was a special Providence in it, that he 'went without a reward then, which procured it 'for him most opportunely at this time. It is not 'improbable, that, as Josephus saith, the history 'of some of his ancestors was read before they 'came to his reign; wherein was set down what 'services men had done, and what preferment or 'gifts had been bestowed upon them; which mov-'ed the king to ask, when they came to this story 'of Mordecai, what had been done for him.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 4, 5. 'Haman came early to court, that he 'might gratify his revenge, and go with more 'pleasure to the banquet. This was another part 'of God's providence, to bring him so soon to 'court, when the king was thus disposed.' Bp. Patrick.—Even Haman might not enter the inner court till called for. (Note, 4:11.)

V. 6—11. We may suppose, that Haman was much pleased to be so speedily called into the king's chamber: but his request was prevented, by his advice being asked on a very different business. Probably, the king was considering what good preferment was vacant, which might suit Mordecai, whom he should delight to honor and reward, as the preserver of his life: but he did not name the person; and Haman's thoughts were so engrossed about himself, that he could not think, the king would honor any one above him, or would delight to honor any one beside him.—His excessive vanity, ambition, presumption, and ostentation, as well as the emptiness of his worthless mind, are fully illustrated by the honors which he chose, supposing them intended for himself. He must, forsooth, have the use of the king's own royal robe, and horse, and crown; one of the most noble princes must be his page, and his herald; and by proclamation it was to be made known, what delight the king had in honoring him! Perhaps Ahasuerus understood his meaning, and was disgusted at his exorbitant pretensions: and while he peremptorily commanded him to do all this to "Mordecai the Jew," he could scarcely help remembering the edict, which Haman had obtained against that people. Haman, however, did not venture to object or demur; his request for leave to hang Mordecai was adjourned sine die; and he was constrained to become page to a man, comparatively obscure, whom he hated and contemned above all other men on earth, while this extraordinary honor was conferred on him! Imagination itself cannot devise a more painful mortification. It cannot indeed be supposed, that Mordecai was greatly pleased with this unmeaning pageantry considered in itself, which would confer no solid advantage, but expose him to great envy: yet he probably considered it as a favorable presage of Esther's success, and of the deliverance of his people from their malicious enemies.—Some learned men think, that "the crown-royal" denotes an ornament by which the king's horse was distinguished; and not the crown which the king himself wore.

V. 12. Mordecai, not elated with the honor which he had received, returned to his place and duty as if nothing had happened. (Notes, 1 Sam. 3:15. Prov. 27:21.) But Haman went home as a condemned criminal, dreading the consequences of this unexpected disaster. If Mordecai had been a person before unknown to Haman, it would have been no real degradation, to be employed in honoring him in this manner, as the preserver of the king's life; though his pride would have been mortified: but, as he was the man whom he mortally hated, and one of that nation whose destruction he had sought and confidently expected; he must conclude that this favor indicated the determined purpose of the king to prefer Mordecai; and consequently foreboded his own ruin. For in such a contest, there could be no alternative between victory and destruction. (Note, Prov. 25:8—10.) The contrast also, between the object of his so early coming to the king, to request permission to hang Mordecai, and the honor which he was in consequence compelled to do him, was in itself most dismaying. Hav

V. 13. "Haman told Zeresh his wife, and his friends," 'who were waiting to hear what was be-'come of Mordecai, whom they advised to get 'hanged on the gallows, ... how cross every thing 'had fallen out to him that morning.' Bp. Patrick. —The "wise men," here mentioned, seem to have been astrologers or magicians, whom he consulted on this occasion; and were probably the same persons whom he had before consulted: (Marg. Ref.—Note, 3:7.) and perhaps they pretended to found their judgment on the principles of their art, or to consult their oracles. Yet what had been observed of the contest between Haman and Mordecai, and the sudden and rapid falls of court-favorites in absolute monarchies; as well as what they must have heard of the wonderful works of JEHOVAH in behalf of his people; were sufficient to convince them, that this unexpected turn was the forerunner of more fatal consequences. But they deduced no salutary counsel from these apprehensions: and indeed their conclusions were entirely calculated to drive Haman to despair. (Notes, 1 Sam. 28:12—19.) His wife also concurred with them in opinion, that these were fatal omens; which was calculated still more to overwhelm him.

V. 14. Haman, in the anguish of his heart, seems to have neglected his appointment; and doubtless he would willingly have been excused from the banquet, to which he had expected to go so cheerfully: (Note, 5:14.) but there was no alternative; he must attend, to hear his accusation, and the judgment in consequence awarded against him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We are in every thing entirely dependent upon God; nor can the whole world purchase an hour's refreshing sleep, if he see good to withhold it: from him therefore we should seek this solace to our cares, and thank him for it when we have enjoyed it. But when, by any means he withholds sleep from us, it is of great importance to employ usefully our waking hours. The cares and duties of our station in society may properly occupy our reflection, to the exclusion of those thoughts that are vain and injurious: but it is best, when we can meditate upon God, and his works, his truths, his precepts, and promises; and when we can bless him for his mercies, and pour out our hearts before him in prayer. (Notes, Ps. 77:2—12.)—The providence of God superintends the most minute concerns of men. Those actions which are the result of caprice, and appear unaccountable, fall in with his wise and gracious purposes, and "not a sparrow falls to the ground without him."—Gratitude even to man, though commended by all, is practised by very few indeed; and commonly least by those who have most in their power. Pride of rank and birth, a variety of pleasures and occupations, and the presence of agreeable flatterers, combine to induce neglect and forgetfulness of those, who have most faithfully and effectually served them; especially if obscure, modest, and unassuming. Yet thus they not only become guilty of the odious sin of ingratitude; but actually yield the superiority to the very man whom they affect to despise: for he that confers, is always superior to him who receives, an unmerited and unrequited favor.—Those qualifications which demand esteem, and those actions which merit a reward, generally meet with neglect, if they do not expose the possessors to ill treatment, in the circles of the great, and in the courts of kings.—The instruments of pleasure and amusement, who help them to forget their misery, and to waste their fleeting moments; the forward, the subtle, and the artful; and those who can sacrifice conscience, honor, and honesty, to wit, ingenuity, and politeness, have hitherto always met with most favor from the great. Let us then learn to serve a Master, who will not let the least well-meant service lose its reward.—And if any reader should recollect, that nothing has been done to requite some benefactor who aided him many years ago, let him not think that the obligation is out of date; but rather let him study how he may, effectually and without further delay, do that which should have been done long since; and delight to honor his benefactors, if he can render them no other recompense.—Pride, envy, and ambition are insatiable; and every sinful passion grows more exorbitant by indulgence. When a man heartily idolizes his important self, he readily fancies that others equally admire him, and are disposed to do him all the honor which he foolishly longs after. If any one open his lips in commendation, doubtless he must be the object! if a favor be mentioned, it must be intended for him! if a preferment be vacant, who but he can be thought of to fill it, provided it be not beneath his acceptance!—But "before honor is humility, and a haughty spirit before a fall:" both God and man delight in rendering the mortification of proud worms proportioned to their ambition: and men of this character meet with many presages on earth of that everlasting contempt and misery which await them in another world, if not rescued from this diabolical vice. (Notes. Dan. 4:34—37. 5:18—28.) They who have flattered them in prosperity, will prove "miserable comforters" in the time of their distress: worldly pleasures will soon become tasteless, and even nauseous, to those who have a conscience burdened with guilt or appalled with terror: and even the wise men of this world have often foreseen the ruin of those, who engage in the unequal contest with the church of God.—But the depth of the believer's distress is the seed-time of his joys; and every victory and comfort is to him an earnest of his final triumph and felicity. The honor, which the Father delights to confer upon his beloved Son, is a pledge of the security and salvation of all whom he represents, and who commit their cause into his hand. Their bitterest enemies shall promote, and be constrained to witness their exaltation; and to know, "what shall be done to the men whom the LORD delighteth to honor;" and how much their "eternal weight of glory" exceeds the worthless, transient honors of the world: while the sight shall increase the anguish and despair of those, who expected to be gratified in effecting their misery and destruction.

2 And [a] the king said again unto Esther on the second day at the banquet of wine, What is thy petition, queen Esther? and it shall be granted thee: and what is thy request? and it shall be performed, even to the half of the kingdom.

3 Then Esther the queen answered and said, If I have found favor in thy sight, O king, and if it please the king, [b] let my life be given me at my petition, and [c] my people at my request:

4 For [d] we are sold, I and my people, [*] to be destroyed, to be slain, and to perish. [e] But if we had been sold for bond-men and bond-women, I had held my tongue, although [f] the enemy could not countervail the king's damage.

5 Then the king Ahasuerus answered and said unto Esther the queen, [g] Who is he, and where is he, [†] that durst presume in his heart to do so?

6 And Esther said, [‡] The adversary and enemy is [h] this wicked Haman. Then Haman [i] was afraid [§] before the king and the queen.

7 ¶ And the king, arising from the banquet of wine [j] in his wrath, went into the palace-garden: and [k] Haman stood up to make request for his life to Esther the queen; [l] for he saw that there was evil determined against him by the king.

8 Then the king returned out of the palace-garden into the place of the banquet of wine; and Haman was fallen upon [m] the bed whereon Esther was. Then said the king, Will he force the queen also [‖] before me in the house? As the word went out of the king's mouth, they [n] covered Haman's face.

NOTES.

Chap. VII. V. 2—4. While the king repeatedly urged Esther to make her request; and, in language more expressive than before, promised to grant it, though it were to the value of half his kingdom; (5:3,6.) she, with the greatest modesty and respect, and in the most simple and affecting manner, besought him, that her own life might be spared, and the lives of her people, which were all involved in one common danger. Without complaining of his conduct in any degree, she stated, that she and her people had been sold as sheep for the slaughter; alluding to the money, which Haman had offered to pay into the treasury for their destruction: she quoted the words of the unrighteous decree, "to be destroyed, to be slain, and to perish," as proving that her life, as well as those of the other Jews, was certainly in danger: (3:13.) and she added, that if they had been only sold for slaves, she would not have interposed; though the enemy could never have made up the loss, which the king would have sustained by thus oppressing his peaceable and industrious subjects. Some interpret the last clause to mean, that if the sufferings of the enslaved Jews, though extreme and undeserved, had not been likewise detrimental to the king's interest, Esther would have held her peace. The whole speech, however, was replete with natural eloquence, and suited to affect and persuade the king.

V. 5. Perhaps Ahasuerus at first scarcely recollected his edict against the Jews, or was not aware of its consequences; or he did not immediately perceive that Esther referred to it: and therefore he could not conceive that any one could be so daring, as to attempt the life of his queen, as well as the destruction of his subjects. The language is peculiarly expressive of astonishment and indignation. 'In the Hebrew the 'words are, "Who is he, whose heart hath filled 'him to do so?" A speech like that in the New 'Testament, (Acts 5:3.) "Why hath Satan filled 'thine heart?" Made thee so daring and pre-'sumptuous.' Bp. Patrick. (Note, Acts 5:1—11, v. 3.)

V. 6. The events, and presages, of the morning no doubt tended to increase Haman's terror on this occasion. He had found, that the king "delighted to honor" Mordecai the Jew; he now discovered that the queen was a Jewess, and strongly attached to her people; he had heard the king repeatedly promise to "grant her request to the half of his kingdom;" and he could not but be aware that his own ruin was impending.

V. 7. We may suppose, that at the moment when Esther mentioned "this wicked Haman," as the enemy of her and of her people, the whole transaction of the edict rushed into the king's mind, and appeared to him in its true colors; and that he was filled with rage, when he reflected how his worthless favorite had seduced him into a measure, calculated to ruin his kingdom, to take away the life of his beloved queen, and exceedingly to tarnish his own reputation; and that he walked about in agitation of mind, not knowing what could be done in such an emergency.

V. 8. Haman had prostrated himself against the couch, on which Esther reclined at the banquet. His only design was to deprecate, with the most abject submission, her displeasure, and to entreat her to intercede for his life. But the king, regarding him as one capable of any villa ny, and growing more enraged by reflecting upon his former machinations; suspected him, or professed to suspect him, of having designs against the queen's honor also.—This word sufficiently informed the attendants of the king's determination: and they directly treated Haman as a condemned criminal, who was never more to see the face of the king, or even the light of the sun, but to be hurried away to immediate death.

in the house of Haman. Then the king said, [s] Hang him thereon.

10 So they hanged Haman on the gallows that he had prepared for Mordecai. [t] Then was the king's wrath pacified.

CHAP. VIII.

Haman's estate is given to Esther; and Mordecai, as her near relation, is preferred in Haman's stead, 1, 2. Esther, with tears, entreats the king to reverse the decree against the Jews, 3—6. The king authorizes the Jews to defend themselves, and sends letters to that effect, throughout the provinces, 7—14. The honors conferred on Mordecai, and the joy of the Jews, 15—17.

ON that day did the king Ahasuerus [a] give the house of Haman the Jews' enemy, unto Esther the queen. And Mordecai [b] came before the king; for Esther had told what he was unto her.

2 And the king took off [c] his ring which he had taken from Haman, and gave it unto Mordecai. And [d] Esther set Mordecai over the house of Haman.

V. 9. Harbonah, probably when he went to call Haman to the banquet, had seen the gallows, and discovered for what purpose it was prepared. Haman had doubtless been greatly envied for his prosperity, and hated for his insolence, in the midst of all the homage which was paid him. But now that the king's mind was evidently alienated from him, the courtiers were glad to please him and the queen, by concurring in Haman's downfal.

V. 10. It is immaterial to us, whether Haman died by crucifixion, or was strangled, or put to death in some other way, before he was suspended on the gibbet. (Notes, Deut. 21:22,23. Josh. 8:29. 2 Sam. 17:23. 18:9. 21:9—14, v. 9. Matt. 27:3—5. Gal. 3:10—14.) Crucifixion however seems to have been a Roman punishment; at least not to have been in use at this early period. (Note, Ps. 22:16—18, v. 16.) It is enough to know, that he suffered the punishment which he had devised for Mordecai. Nec lex est æquior ulla, quam necis artifices arte perire sua. 'There 'is no law more equitable, than that the devisers 'of death should perish by their own art.'—Thus "the righteous is delivered out of trouble, and the wicked cometh in his stead." (Note, Prov. 11:8.)—'In this wonderful deliverance of the 'Jewish nation, there was no extraordinary man-'ifestation of God's power, no particular cause or 'agent, that was in its working advanced above 'the ordinary pitch of nature; and yet the con-'trivance, or suiting of those ordinary agents ap-'pointed by God, is more admirable than if the 'same end had been effected by means truly mi-'raculous.' Dr. Jackson in Bp. Patrick.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The repeated promises, even of weak, mutable, and selfish men, encourage us to make our requests to them with great expectation of success: much more then should the exceedingly great and precious promises of the unchangeable God, embolden us to present many and large petitions to him, in behalf of ourselves and others, and with the full assurance of receiving far more than we ask.—If the love of life inspire such earnest and pathetic pleadings, with those "who can only kill the body;" how fervent and importunate should our continual prayers be to "Him, who is able to destroy both body and soul in hell!" And how affectionately should we pray for the eternal salvation of our relatives, friends, and neighbors, and all around us!—In supplicating the great men of this world, we must be very cautious not to withhold proper respect, or to give needless offence; even just complaints must be suppressed, and that asked as a great favor, which might equitably be demanded as a debt. But when we approach the King of kings, provided we come with humble reverence and uprightness of heart, we cannot ask or expect too much: for though nothing but wrath is our due, he is able and willing to "do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think."—Persecution is as impolitic as it is unjust: nor would the wealth of both the Indies compensate the temporal loss, which must arise to every prince, who puts to death his conscientious, industrious subjects, immures them in prisons, drives them out of his dominions, harasses them with oppressions, and tempts them to hypocrisy.—Men often commit crimes without remorse, which, when described in their nature and consequences by proper language, or pointed out to them in the conduct of others, appear most horrible and atrocious: and when they find upon reflection, the nature and effects of their own heedless conduct, they are filled with anguish and remorse. (Notes, 2 Sam. 12:1—14. Ps. 51:1—6.) Yet alas! their indignation frequently falls exclusively upon their tempters or accomplices, instead of producing unreserved self-condemnation and abhorrence. But when such convictions are excited in those in authority, though they do not terminate in true repentance, they may yet produce many salutary effects, by inducing them to punish atrocious criminals, to protect the innocent, and to rectify grievous abuses.—Those who are most insolent in prosperity, are commonly the most abject in adversity: and the enemies of God shall all be brought down before his people, and made to know his love towards them. (Ex. 11:8. Is. 60:14. Rev. 3:9.)—When men have proved themselves capable of the most daring and horrid crimes; they have no reason to expect any other, but to be suspected where they are not guilty, and to have the worst constructions put upon their most innocent actions.—The favor of men is deceitful and precarious: the higher wicked ambition climbs, the more rapid and terrible will be its fall. When haughty favorites, either of mighty princes, or of fickle multitudes, begin to totter upon their slippery eminence, all hands join to hurry them down, either out of envy, revenge, hatred, or similar ambition: and even they, who have most caressed and delighted to honor them, will often as much delight in their misery and ruin. Thus "the fear of the wicked cometh upon him," and that suddenly: he is "taken in his own net, and entangled in his own devices;" and "when he perishes there is shouting." (Notes, Prov. 10:24. 11:10,11.)—At the day of final retribution, when the whole wickedness of the ungodly shall be discovered, and the justice of God displayed in their everlasting punishment; all the righteous shall joyfully exclaim, "So let all thine enemies perish, O LORD!" (Notes, Rev. 18:20. 19:1—6.) but those who love him "shall shine forth as the sun, in the kingdom of their Father."

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1, 2. Some of Esther's attendants were acquainted with Mordecai's relation to her; (Note, 4:4.) and the king knew that the king, and [e] fell down at his feet, and [*] besought him with tears, to put away [f] the mischief of Haman the Agagite, and his device that he had devised against the Jews.

4 Then the king [g] held out the golden sceptre towards Esther. So Esther arose, and stood before the king,

5 And said, If it please the king, [h] and if I have found favor in his sight, and the thing seem right before the king, and [i] I be pleasing in his eyes, let it be written to reverse the [†] letters devised by Haman the son of Hammedatha the Agagite, [‡] which he wrote to destroy the Jews, which are in all the king's provinces.

6 For [k] how can I [§] endure to see [l] the evil that shall come unto my people? or how can I endure to see the destruction of my kindred?

[Practical Observations.]

7 Then the king Ahasuerus said unto Esther the queen, and to Mordecai the Jew, [m] Behold, I have given Esther the house of Haman, and [n] him they have hanged upon the gallows, because he laid his hand upon the Jews.

8 Write ye also for the Jews, as it liketh you, [o] in the king's name, and seal it with the king's ring: for the writing which is written in the king's name, and sealed with the king's ring, [p] may no man reverse.

9 Then were [q] the king's scribes called at that time in the third month, (that is, the month Sivan,) on the three and twentieth day thereof; and it was written, according to all that Mordecai commanded, unto the Jews, [r] and to the lieutenants, and the deputies and rulers of the provinces, which are from India unto Ethiopia, an hundred twenty and seven provinces, unto every province according to the writing thereof, and unto every people after their language, and to the Jews according to their writing, [s] and according to their language.

he was of Jewish extraction: (6:10.) but he did not know that Mordecai was Esther's own cousin, and had been as a father to her, till on this occasion she disclosed it to him. Mordecai in consequence was introduced to Ahasuerus, and preferred by him: and as he had been so kind a friend to the queen when she was in destitute circumstances, and had also preserved the king's life, none could have fairer pretensions. The ring with the royal signet seems to have continued with Haman, as denoting the high offices which he bore under the king, till he was deposed and condemned; when, being taken from him, it was given to Mordecai as his successor. (Notes, 3:10, 11. Gen. 41:41—43. Is. 22:20—25. Jer. 22:24—27.) Haman's large estate also, being confiscated for his crimes, was given to Esther, and managed for her by Mordecai: (Notes, Job 27:13—23, vv. 16,17. Prov. 13:22. 28:8. Ec. 2:24—26.) and if that haughty man could have foreseen these events, the prospect would have imbittered his life, and even augmented the anguish of his death.

V. 3—6. Haman was dead, Mordecai was advanced, and the queen's person was protected: but the edict against the Jews remained in force, and their numerous enemies, in every province, would certainly endeavor to carry it into execution; so that Esther had not yet obtained the deliverance of her people, and that lay nearest to her heart. Probably, she was sometimes called for by the king: but to shew that she was interested in the concerns of her nation, even more than in her own safety, she again ventured uncalled into his presence to plead for them. She seems to have been peculiarly earnest on this occasion; for she fell at his feet, and besought him with tears to grant her request. It may be supposed, that Ahasuerus hesitated in this perplexing case: as not knowing how to extricate himself with credit from so great a difficulty, and as reluctant to proclaim to all the world the folly, into which he had been seduced. But Esther, with great discretion, avoided every intimation that the king himself had issued the decree, and expressed herself as if it had been not only Haman's device, but altogether his work, even as if the edict had been forged by him. Indeed it had originated in his pride and revenge; his artful insinuations had decoyed the king to give an inconsiderate assent to it; and he had framed it in his own words, and to answer his own purposes. (Notes, 3:6—15.)—'If she herself were spared, she represents to him, 'that it would break her heart to see all her kin-'dred, nay her whole nation, destroyed.' Bp. Patrick. Her plea, and the expressions used in urging it, are peculiarly pathetic and emphatical, and suited to excite the deepest and most tender sympathy; as well as to shew her fervent affection for her people, as the people of God.

V. 8. The decree against the Jews was irrevocable: but another edict might counteract its operation, and that would also become irreversible: and Esther and Mordecai were allowed to frame one for the purpose, as explicit as they pleased; and to ratify it in the same manner. Thus, that most absurd law, or constitution, made it necessary to authorize a civil war throughout this vast empire; both parties acting by and against the king's authority, at the same time!—The maxim in our government, that 'no act can be so 'framed, but that the same authority which enact-'ed it may repeal it,' is immensely more suited to the state of human nature: for no human wisdom can foresee all the effects of any regulation, till experience has evinced them. While the king had legal authority to put the evil counsellor to death, to confiscate his estate, and to prefer his most hated enemy to his high offices, so that no objection seems to have been advanced by his nobles and counsellors; he had not the legal power to reverse the obnoxious decree! (Notes, 2:1. 3:10,11.)—'Thus he chose to fill his realm with 'blood, rather than revoke a rash decree.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 9. (Notes, 1,2. 3:12—15.) More than two months had past, since Haman's decree was framed. (3:7.) Probably Ethiopia or the south of Egypt is intended.

10 And he wrote [t] in the king Ahasuerus's name, and sealed it with the king's ring; and sent letters [u] by posts on horseback, and riders on mules, camels, and [x] young dromedaries;

11 Wherein the king granted the Jews which were in every city [y] to gather themselves together, and to stand for their life, to destroy, to slay, and to cause to perish, all the power of the people and province that would assault them, both little ones and women, [z] and to take the spoil of them for a prey;

12 Upon [a] one day, in all the provinces of king Ahasuerus, namely, [b] upon the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, which is the month Adar.

The words for the other animals, on which some of the messengers rode, are unusual, and learned men are by no means agreed about the meaning of them. Probably they were derived from the Persian language, or from that of some of the eastern nations. But the greatest speed was needful in this emergency, and every method was taken to secure it. (Marg. Ref.) 'He sent 'men on horseback, ... and upon other creatures 'as swift as horses, and upon mules both young 'and old, according as the places were nearer or 'further off. So he ordered the letters to be sent 'with great speed by the post, which carried them 'from stage to stage, till they came to the place 'whither they were directed.' Bp. Patrick.

V. 11—13. This last decree evidently shewed the king's intentions, though the former edict remained in force: so that they who assaulted the Jews, were, in reality, though not formally, rebelling against his authority. The Jews were not allowed to assault their enemies: but they might legally assemble and combine in defending themselves, and slay any number of those who attacked them. As the children and women were included in Haman's decree, they were also mentioned in this: but the Jews did not avail themselves of the clause; neither did they take any spoil. (3:13. Note, 9:6—10.) Haman aimed at extermination, they only at self-defence. If this edict had not been granted, the Jews would have been punishable for taking previous measures in order to defend themselves: so that they could not have engaged, with concert or prospect of success, in any measure for that purpose: and even if any had escaped the massacre, they would have been exposed as criminals to the sword of the magistrate, for resisting the execution of the law. They might, and doubtless would, when rendered desperate, have sold their lives as dear as possible; but they could have had little hopes of escaping, when overwhelmed by numbers, who were countenanced by the governors in every province. But now the advantage was entirely on their side: as none who valued the king's favor would injure them; and they might prepare with union and concert to repel the assault of others, and to inflict deserved punishment on their inveterate enemies. (Marg. Ref. e.)

V. 14. (Note, 10.) Though this decree was ratified above eight months before the appointed day; yet there would be time little enough to publish it throughout all the provinces of this immense empire, considering the great distance of many of them from Shushan; and to give the Jews opportunity to prepare arms, and take proper measures for their own preservation. The king himself therefore hastened the messengers, as dreading the consequences of the former edict.

V. 15. Mordecai, being now publicly recognized as the chief minister and favorite of the king, went from the palace, arrayed according to his rank, in conformity to the customs of the country. (Marg. Ref. f.) It seems that the people of Shushan in general, having a better opinion of his integrity and capacity than of Haman's, were greatly pleased with the change: (Notes, Prov. 11:10,11. 28:12,28. 29:2.) though the sequel shews, that there was a strong party of rancorous enemies to the Jews, residing there. —A great crown, &c.] 'Not like that of the 'kings, but such a coronet as was worn by the 'peers of the realm.' *Bp. So that their hopes revived, and they began, as it were, to walk in the sunshine, and were filled with gladness, and treated with respect by those who had despised them; being evidently in favor both with God and man. CHAP. IX.

On the day appointed, the Jews, aided by the rulers, slay their enemies; and among the rest five hundred men in Shushan, and Haman's ten sons, 1—10. The king hearing this, at Esther's request, allows the Jews in Shushan to stand against their enemies on the day following, when three hundred more are slain; and he causes Haman's sons to be hanged on the gallows erected by Haman, 11—15. The Jews throughout the provinces slay seventy-five thousand men, 16. They rejoice with feasting on the two following days, 17—19. These days are appointed by Esther and Mordecai as an annual festival, in commemoration of this deliverance, and called the feast of Purim, 20—32.

NOW [a] in the twelfth month, that is, the month Adar, on the thirteenth day of the same, when the king's commandment and his decree drew near to be put in execution, in the day that the enemies of the Jews [b] hoped to have power over them; ([c] though it was turned to the contrary, that the Jews had rule over them that hated them;)

2 The Jews [d] gathered themselves together in their cities, throughout all the provinces of the king Ahasuerus, to lay hand on such [e] as sought their hurt: and no man could withstand them; for [f] the fear of them fell upon all people.

Jews, many were convinced that God was with them, and that they would certainly prevail in the contest: being therefore afraid of perishing among their enemies, and desirous of sharing the rising prosperity of his people, they embraced their religion, and united interests with them. We may suppose that some were true converts, and others only formal professors, as it commonly happens in such cases. Haman's plot, however, to destroy the Jews, was overruled to increase their numbers. (Notes, Zech. 8:20—23. Acts 12:1—4,24.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

Many of those, who most prosper in the world, would have little alacrity in their pursuits, or joy in their possessions, if they could foresee to whom their riches would devolve, and what use would be made of them. It is, however, a good thing when, consistently with justice, that wealth, which has pampered pride and luxury, and increased insolence and oppression, is transferred to those, who will improve it to the glory of God and the benefit of mankind.—No advancement should render us forgetful of our indigent relatives, or indifferent about the public good, and the peace and prosperity of the church. These especially should be dearer to us, than life itself: and when we have obtained our requests for ourselves; we should be the more fervent in prayer for our brethren, and in using our influence and venturing all consequences for their good.—If we would affect others, we should study to get our own hearts suitably impressed; and in many cases, we may be more importunate in asking favors for our friends and brethren, and for the poor, than we ought to be for ourselves.—It is a good and cogent plea, when we are praying for the conversion of our children or relatives, to say, "How can I endure to see the evil, that shall come upon them? How can I endure to see the destruction of my kindred?" And it forms an argument equally forcible, to induce us to use every means for their good, with assiduity and perseverance.—Bad examples, unjust laws, rash projects, and wicked books, often prove an extensive and durable curse to the world, when the authors of them are removed: no wisdom suffices to prevent their fatal tendency; and, as we must all be answerable for the consequences of our misconduct, this should render us very circumspect, lest our guilt should accumulate even after our death. (Note, Luke 16:27—31.)

V. 7—17.

Every regulation in society, however apparently reasonable and beneficial, which does not advert to the fallen nature of man, will, on trial, be found unsuitable to his real condition, and inconsistent with his best interests: and all provisions, made to humor the ambition and passions of princes, will eventually embarrass and ensnare them. We are, however, indispensably bound to adopt every method of preventing the fatal effects of our past mistakes, or crimes; even though we should be constrained to proclaim our own folly to the world: and much expedition should be used, when the lives of men are in danger, or their minds distracted with terrors.—If it was proper, that the decree of Ahasuerus should be communicated to every nation in its own language; how reasonable and necessary is it, that the holy law and gracious gospel of our God should be put into every one's hands in his own tongue!—Those who sow in tears and prayers, may expect speedily to reap with joy.—External decorations are insignificant in the judgment of the wise and pious: yet they may properly distinguish those in authority; and, while they procure them respect from the multitudes, who look no further, they should remind them of the duties to which their dignities call them.—The preferment of wise and pious men ought to be matter of rejoicing to all: but the people of God have the most cause for gladness. They may expect to be delivered from the darkness of oppression, to enjoy the light of peace and prosperity; and to meet with honor, in some measure proportioned to the contempt, which they before endured. And when believers "have rest, and walk in the fear of the Lord, and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost, they will be multiplied." Indeed, the attempts of Satan and his agents, to destroy the church by cruel persecutions, have uniformly tended to the increase of true Christians. May the Lord speedily "destroy every enemy who hath done evil in his sanctuary:" may the princes of the earth become nursing fathers to his church: may his people have "light, and joy, and honor, a feast and a good day" on earth, anticipating the joy and gladness of heaven: and may Jesus himself reign, by the power of his grace, wherever the sun diffuses his beams; and may he fill the earth with truth and righteousness! Amen.

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1, 2. (Marg. Ref.—Notes, Is. 14:1—6. Rev. 11:7—12.)—As the Jews were not charged with exceeding the limits, assigned them in the king's edict, it may be concluded that they assaulted none, except such as appeared in arms against them: but when they were attacked, they vigorously pursued their advantage. Neither the fear of God, nor that of the king, could overcome the desperate enmity of numbers against the Jews, whom they had hoped to extirpate; so that, perhaps urged on by the enraged friends of Haman, and all his party, they attacked them on the day appointed, in every part of the empire: yet they were every where speedily intimidated, and yielded the Jews an easy and decisive victory.

5 Thus the Jews [l] smote all their enemies with [m] the stroke of the sword, and slaughter, and destruction, and did † what they would unto those that hated them.

V. 3, 4. The late decree, and the report which accompanied it of Mordecai's increasing greatness, rendered all the governors afraid of offending him, lest they should fall under the king's displeasure: so that they generally assisted the Jews, which gave them a decided advantage in the bloody contest. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5—10. The sons of Haman seem to have combined against the Jews, by way of revenging their father's death; as the king and Mordecai were out of their reach. At the head of their retainers, probably, they lead on the attack in the royal city of Shushan, but they were all slain, with five hundred of their party.—As the Jews professed only to defend their own lives, when they "did what they would unto those that hated them;" they would not take their spoil, or any part of it: and there is no intimation, that they injured their families, or any individual, who was not found in arms against them. (Notes, 3:12—15. 8:11—13.)

V. 13. As it cannot be supposed that Esther was actuated by revenge in this request: it is probable she had learned from Mordecai, that Haman's retainers still formed a faction, not only dangerous to the Jews, but to the state; and were prepared to renew the attack on the next day. She therefore desired, that the Jews might defend themselves, and pursue their assailants, in order that the party might be crushed or finally intimidated: and also, that the bodies of Haman's sons might be suspended on the gallows, prepared by their father; to shew all persons concerned, that by assaulting the Jews, they would expose themselves to the indignation of the king. (Note, 7:10.)

V. 15. 'Some that appeared against them, 'perhaps escaped their hands, whom they might 'meet withal the next day.' ... They 'in the con-'flict escaped by flight, and were now found out 'and killed.' Bp. Patrick.—It does not however appear, that they were authorized by the new decree, to slay any, but those who assaulted them, or that they actually did so. Some think, that many of those slain in Shushan, and in other parts of the empire, were Amalekites, and that thus the prediction, concerning the utter destruction of Amalek, was exactly accomplished. (Notes, 3:1. Ex. 17:14—16.)

V. 16. Seventy-five thousand, &c.] All this large number lost their lives, through the pride and revenge of one wicked man, but by their own malice and enmity to the worshippers of JEHOVAH. Thus the power and spirits of the enemies of the Jews were broken, and peace and rest were prepared for them. It is not recorded that any Jews were slain on this occasion; and probably their preservation was as remarkable, as the destruction of their assailants.—They were indeed placed in the most extraordinary circumstances: but as they were sanctioned in what they did by the king's authority, same rested they, and made it a day of feasting and gladness.

18 But the Jews that were at Shushan assembled together [y] on the thirteenth day thereof, and on the fourteenth thereof; and on the fifteenth day of the same they rested, and made it a day of feasting and gladness.

19 Therefore the Jews of the villages, that dwelt in the unwalled towns, made the fourteenth day of the month Adar a day of [z] gladness and feasting, and a good day, and of sending portions one to another.

20 And Mordecai [a] wrote these things; and sent letters unto all the Jews that were [b] in all the provinces of the king Ahasuerus, both nigh and far;

21 To establish this among them, that they should keep the fourteenth day of the month Adar, and the fifteenth day of the same, yearly;

22 As [c] the days wherein the Jews rested from their enemies, and the month which was turned unto them [d] from sorrow to joy, and from mourning into a good day: that they should make them days of feasting and joy, and of [e] sending portions one to another, and gifts to the poor.

23 And the Jews undertook to do as they had begun, and as Mordecai had written unto them:

24 Because Haman the son of Hammedatha the Agagite, [f] the enemy of all the Jews, had devised against the Jews to destroy them, and had cast [g] Pur, that is, the lot, to [*] consume them, and to destroy them; and stood in defence of their own lives; as they slew none but those who attacked them, and universally declined availing themselves of the king's permission to enrich themselves with the spoil; they must be allowed to have acted in an unexceptionable manner; and were no more chargeable with the blood shed by them, than if they had been engaged in the most necessary defensive war: and indeed it was one of the most necessary defensive wars, that ever any people or nation engaged in.—'Thereby we may judge 'what a great number of Jews still remained in 'other countries, and did not return to their own. V. 17—19. Note, 21—32.

V. 20. "Mordecai wrote these things," or the history contained in this book, as the words most obviously imply; and not merely the letters afterwards mentioned, as many understand it. It is most probable, that he wrote an account of these interesting transactions, and sent it with his letters into all the provinces of the empire. This, no doubt, included Judea and Jerusalem; the inhabitants of which were as much aimed at in Haman's decree, as the Jews dispersed in other countries were.—The contrast between his style and that of Nehemiah, is very remarkable. The latter is interspersed with ejaculations and pious reflections; (Notes, Neh. 2:4. 4:4, 5. 5:19. 6:5—9. 13:14,20—22, v. 22,31.) the former treats of divine things, without any explicit mention of God and religion. (Note, 4:13,14.) The different situation in which the two writers were placed, and the objects which they aimed at in writing, might have as much influence in causing this difference, as their different dispositions. Nehemiah's manner is in general most worthy of imitation: yet in some circumstances men are not to be censured, if they deem it expedient to imitate Mordecai. (Preface.)

V. 21—32. These verses contain the institution of the feast of Purim, which the Jews observe to this day. When the second decree of Ahasuerus was published, they had in every place "joy, and gladness, a feast, and a good day." (Notes, 8:16,17.) And when they prevailed in the contest in all parts of the empire, on the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, they with one common impulse observed the fourteenth as a festival, with joy and gladness. But the Jews at Shushan were, on that day likewise, engaged in conflict, and the fifteenth of the month was their day of rest and joy and festivity. (17—19.) Mordecai therefore wrote to his people in every place, proposing the observance of both these days annually, in commemoration of their deliverance, by Jews and proselytes, throughout their dispersions, and to all future generations. And upon the receipt of these letters, the Jews every where consented to the proposal. Yet it seems, that they afterwards grew negligent: and therefore a second letter was written, with all authority, by Esther and Mordecai, enjoining the observance; which was accompanied "with words of peace and truth;" (30) that is, with affectionate good wishes, prayers, and congratulations; and with wholesome counsels and instructions. The festival therefore was appointed by authority and by royal proclamation, yet under the direction and according to the mind of the Spirit of God. It was evidently proper to perpetuate the memory of so extraordinary a deliverance: and no doubt Esther and Mordecai did right in requiring the Jews on this great occasion, thus to keep it in remembrance, and transmit the memorial of it to their posterity. It was appointed that those days should be spent in feasting and joy, in hospitality and liberality to the poor. But, as the prayers, which without doubt attended the fasting of the Jews in Shushan, are not mentioned; (Note, 4:13,14.) it cannot reasonably be questioned but that praises and thanksgivings to God at first attended their feasting and rejoicing, though not recorded. Even to this day the Jews are used to assemble, at the time appointed, in their synagogues, to read over this book of Esther, and to perform some acts of religious worship: but the feast has long since degenerated into a season of riot and excess.—The word Purim signifies the lots, (being the plural of the word Pur,) in remembrance of the lots cast by Haman, by which the day was deferred till time was allowed for defeating the whole design, and all his tokens were frustrated. (Note, 3:7.) The fastings, lamentations, and prayers, which preceded the deliverance, were to be remembered with peculiar joy and gratitude. (31) Some think it was intended, that the thirteenth day should be observed as a day of fasting and prayer, as an introduction to the festival; and the Jews at present profess to observe it as such: but the decree does not admit of this construction. Finally, the decree was added to this book of Esther, in which the history of these transactions was recorded, that the institution might never be forgotten.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—16.

The obstinate enemies and persecutors of the church are often left to act in the most infatuated manner; being urged on by malice, in opposition to the most evident dictates of prudence. (Notes, Ex. 14:5—9,21—23.) For the records of history shew, that when the enemies of God's people have "hoped to have power over them," it has generally been "turned to the contrary," and they have gained the advantage "over them that hated them." Yet, neither observation, nor experience, nor demonstration, can subdue the enmity of the carnal mind, which seizes every opportunity of exerting itself: and even the protection of the ruling powers, if not very decisive, has generally been found insufficient to repress the spirit of persecution; though men commonly fear the displeasure of a king, or of powerful courtiers, far more than the wrath of almighty God.—The aggressor is answerable for all the blood shed in unjust war; provided the advantages gained by those, who stand in their own defence in a good cause, be not pushed on with revenge and cruelty: and when whole nations are attacked on account of religion, they have as good a right to defend themselves, as when the assault is made on any other unrighteous pretext.—But in every case the servants of God should manifest a disposition to humanity and disinterestedness: and frequently they ought to decline advantages, which might legally be obtained.—Prosperous sinners often bequeath their vices and enmities to their posterity; the effects of which remain, when their ill-gotten or abused affluence is dissipated: but children will never be ruined by the crimes of their parents, unless they imitate them. (Notes, Ex. 20:5. Ez. 18:2—4,14—17.)—The pertinacity of some offenders renders it necessary for the most merciful rulers to use severity: and the enmity and obstinacy of wicked men will display the justice of God in their final and eternal destruction, when the whole world will know all their crimes. But what dire effects to thousands may result from one malicious, or even incautious action! (Notes, 3:8—11.)

V. 17—32.

When the sense of recent mercies is lively in our hearts, we should hasten to pour out our praises to the Lord. Gratitude to him, when united with temperance and liberal kindness to the poor, will sanctify our rejoicing, and render a day of feasting a good day to our own souls, and to our brethren. (Notes, Neh. 8:9—12. P. O. 9—18.)—In reviewing our mercies, we should advert to our previous fears and distresses: we should consider, how our "sorrow hath been turned into joy;" what imminent danger of death or destruction we have escaped; what cries, prayers, confessions, and vows we have made; and with what remarkable circumstances our deliverances have been attended, our enemies disappointed, and our comforts renewed. When our mercies are personal, we should be careful that we do not by forgetfulness lose the comfort of them, and withhold from our God the glory due unto his name. When they are very public and remarkable, rulers in church or state should unite authority, with admonitions and "words of peace and truth," to prevent the memorial of them from perishing; and that all, who shall eventually share the advantages, may join in rendering praise unto the Lord. But alas! the best institutions are liable to be perverted by human depravity; and to degenerate, not only into a form, but into an occasion of sin. Holy joy in God is supplanted by sensual indulgence and carnal mirth: under pretence of celebrating great deliverances, or even of commemorating the mysteries of redemption, professed Christians often behave, as if they were the devotees of Bacchus or of Momus; and, instead of "a good day" and a feast unto the Lord, they imitate the worshippers of the golden calf, and "sit down to eat and drink, and rise up to play!" (Note, Ex. 32:1. P. O. 1—14.) Nothing more deeply disgraces religion, or more injuriously stupifies the conscience, than such abuses. May the Lord then teach us to rejoice with that holy joy, which anticipates and prepares for the felicity of heaven!

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1—3. These verses close the narrative, as it stands in the original Hebrew; and are very improperly detached from the preceding chapter. As, however, they here stand, they begin another chapter, which is continued in the apocryphal supplement to this book, and opens with the fourth verse of the tenth chapter. The nature of Ahasuerus's tribute, and the acts of his power, are not declared in the sacred scripture; but the preferment of Mordecai proved no diminution of the king's greatness, or detriment to his subjects at large; and it was peculiarly advantageous to the Jews. (Marg. Ref. f, g.) Mordecai neither concealed his religion, nor grew shy of his people, though they were generally poor and despised. His authority seems to have been durable; and he was greatly honored by all his brethren: for he used his power to protect them and promote their welfare; and he behaved towards them with all condescension and affection.—This book is placed in our Bibles the last of the historical records of the Jews; though the events recorded by Nehemiah seem to have occurred subsequent to most, if not all, in this book. (Note, Neh. 2:6.)—However, for above four hundred years, that is, till the coming of the Messiah, the scriptural narrative of that favored nation is suspended.—A compendious view of the most material events which are transmitted to us by other writers, is added, at the close of this book, in order to connect the Old Testament with the New.—It has been observed, that no pagan writer mentions any of the events recorded in the book of Esther: but, in fact, little comparatively is known concerning the Persian kings, or the Medo-Persian empire, except as connected with the history of Greece, and as recorded by Grecian historians: and it cannot be supposed, that the concerns of the Jews, as dispersed through the vast empire of Persia, would at all attract the attention of that proud people, who considered all nations, except themselves, as Barbarians; and who peculiarly despised the Jews, as a bigoted and narrow-minded race; because they would not conform to any of their varied idolatries, or embrace any of their systems of skeptical philosophy.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The concerns of the despised worshippers of God are deemed more important by the Spirit of inspiration, than the greatest exploits of the most illustrious monarch upon earth.—Those who enjoy the benefits of civil government, are reasonably required to contribute to the expense of it: but it is happy for the people when taxes are imposed with justice and equality; and the advancement of wise and good men forms the most honorable part of the conduct of powerful princes.—Rulers should consult the advantage of all their peaceable subjects: but they are peculiarly required to seek the welfare of the church, by protecting it from oppression, and encouraging the worship and ordinances of God.—That greatness is truly honorable which is usefully employed: and when those fill exalted stations, who behave with humility and condescension, and who manifest a due regard to religion, and affection for their inferiors; they will be most likely to escape envy, and to be honored and accepted by the multitude of their brethren.—Contentment, diligence, and fidelity in lower employments, form a hopeful presage of good conduct in more important and exalted situations: and though men of superior talents and excellency may for a season appear to be buried in obscurity; yet, if the Lord have work for them to do, he will bring them forth to more extensive usefulness. We should be thankful for equitable and peaceful rulers and temporal privileges; but all earthly grandeur is passing away:—may we then seek those riches and that glory, which shall endure to all eternity!

AND THE

SURROUNDING NATIONS, AS FAR AS CONNECTED WITH THE JEWS,

FROM THE CLOSE OF THE SACRED CANON OF THE OLD TESTAMENT, UNTIL THE TIMES OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

Soon after the events, recorded by Nehemiah and in the book of Esther, or perhaps before the close of them, Artaxerxes Longimanus died, and was succeeded by Darius Nothus. (B. C. 423.) He dying, was succeeded by Artaxerxes Mnemon; (B. C. 405;) in whose time, Johanan, the high priest, murdered his brother Joshua in the temple, and the nation was fined by the Persians. After some other successions, of little consequence to the narrative, in our present view of it, Darius Codomannus, the last king of the Medo-Persian empire, ascended the throne. (B. C. 336.) During all these years the Jews were entirely a province of the Medo-Persian empire.

Xerxes, the father of Artaxerxes Longimanus, had before this unsuccessfully attempted to subjugate Greece. (Note, Dan. 11:2—4.) This so exasperated the Greeks, that they long meditated a design of subverting the Persian empire.—Various events, not material in this epitome, made way for Alexander the great, king of Macedon, to be appointed commander of a Grecian army, which was raised, for the purpose of invading the Persian dominions. With about thirty thousand select troops, he passed over into Asia; (B. C. 334;) and, with a celerity, unexampled in history, having vanquished the immense armies of Darius, in three pitched battles, the last of which was followed by the murder of Darius by his own servants, he terminated the Medo-Persian empire, and assumed the dominion over all the nations contained in it. (B. C. 330.) (Notes, Dan. 2:39. 7:6. 8:5—7. 11:2—4.) In a short time Alexander, having still more enlarged his dominions, died at Babylon; and after many severe and bloody contests, his empire was divided into four kingdoms, Macedonia, Thrace, Syria, and Egypt. (B. C. 323.) (Notes, Dan. 7:6. 8:8.)—The Jews, however, had little concern, for some ages, with any of these, except the kings of Syria, and of Egypt, called by Daniel, the king of the north, and the king of the south. (Note, Dan. 11:2—6.) Judea lay between the dominions of the successive rulers of these kingdoms; and was, for a long time, under the power of one or the other of them; (Notes, Dan. 11:5—20.) and exposed to the ravages of the armies, which marched through the land. At first they formed a part of the kingdom of Egypt, under Ptolemy Soter: after his death, Ptolemy Philadelphus, his son and successor, shewed them much favor; and during his reign, the Hebrew scriptures began to be translated into Greek, for the benefit of the Jews, who lived in Egypt and other places, where the Greek was known.—This translation is called the Septuagint; and by means of it, many of the learned Gentiles acquired considerable acquaintance with the Old Testament.

The Jews, having been cruelly oppressed by Ptolemy Philopater, (who, attempting to enter into the holy of holies, was opposed and hindered by the priests and rulers, which he indignantly resented;) revolted from him, and submitted to Antiochus the Great, king of Syria. But Antiochus, having rashly engaged in war with the Romans, was vanquished, and reduced to make an inglorious peace; which gave the Romans, the fourth kingdom, their first entrance into the dominions of the Grecian empire, or the third kingdom. (Notes, Dan. 2:39—43. 7:7,8. 11:17—19,31.) After the death of An-tiochus the great, and the inglorious reign of his son, Seleucus Philopater; (Note, Dan. 11:20.) Antiochus Epiphanes, called by Daniel "a vile person," succeeded, and most cruelly oppressed and persecuted the Jews, causing all the worship at the temple to cease, and even dedicating it to his own idol. (Notes, Dan. 8:9—12. 11:21—30.) But Mattathias, a priest, and his sons called the Maccabees, opposed him; and being wonderfully assisted and prospered, in many bloody contests, under Judas Maccabæus, the power of Antiochus was overthrown, his persecution terminated, the temple was recovered and its service restored; and Antiochus soon came to a miserable end. These events are recorded, in the books of Maccabees, the first of which especially is allowed to contain authentic history. (Notes, Dan. 11:31—35.) From about this time, (B. C. 153,) the Jews, taking advantage of the enfeebled state of the contending kingdoms, (Syria and Egypt,) became independent under the government of the Maccabees, who united in general the high priesthood with the sovereign authority; but without the name of king, till the time of Aristobulus, son of Hyrcanus. (B. C. 107.) This epitome must exclude the notice of the intestine contests of the different parties, among the Jews; which were many, fierce, and often bloody.

At length, however, the Romans greatly extending their conquests, the kingdom of Syria was reduced into the form of a Roman province, by Pompey the great. He not long after besieged Jerusalem; and having taken it, he entered into the holy of holies; (B. C. 63;) but after that, he never prospered. (Note, Dan. 11:31, conclusion.)—From this time, the Jews became dependent on the Romans.—At length Antipater, the father of Herod the great, an Edomite, by the favor of Julius Cæsar, (who had prevailed against Pompey, and obtained dominion at Rome,) was made ruler in Judea. (B. C. 47.) After Antipater's death, Herod his son, called by Matthew, "Herod the king," by the favor of the Romans, and by force of arms, obtained possession of Jerusalem, and was established in regal authority; being by birth an Edomite, but proselyted to Judaism; which authority was at length confirmed by Augustus Cæsar. (B. C. 30.) This dignity he maintained with great ability, but most atrocious cruelties, in his own family, as well as among others, till the birth of Christ. In this interim, he had built many cities, and almost rebuilt the temple. (Notes, Hag. 2:6—9. Matt. 16:13—16. John 2:18—22. Acts 23:35.) His atrociously cruel attempt to murder the infant Savior, is recorded by the evangelist; and soon after he died most miserably. (Notes, Matt. 2:) After some years, in which the dominions of Herod were divided into four Tetrarchies under the sons of Herod, (Note, Matt. 14:1,2.) Judea became a Roman province; the sceptre departed from Judah, for Shiloh was come; (Note, Gen. 49:9,10.) and under Pontius Pilate, the Roman procurator, in the reign of Tiberius Cæsar, the successor of Augustus, the Lord Jesus was crucified.—Galilee, however, still remained under the government of Herod the Tetrarch, son of Herod the king, who beheaded John Baptist: but after some other changes, at length the whole Jewish state was subverted under Titus the son of Vespasian. (A. D. 79.)
